PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 15, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray that we may be led through the hours of this day without sin, that Thou wilt give to us divine inspiration to follow that which Thou dost mark out for us, and that at the close of the day we may look back upon the service we have rendered with a conscience void of offense toward God and man. Bless our Nation. Prosper us in all of our work. Hasten the day for the reestablishment of peace and brotherhood in the world. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. HARDY, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, and Mr. EDMONDS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COLT. I present a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[State of Rhode Island, in general assembly, January session, A. D. 1918.]

Resolution indorsing the so-called daylight-saving bill now before Congress and urging the Senators and Representatives from this State to give it their cordial support.

Whereas the contingencies of war have brought renewed attention to the demand for changing hours of time standards; and

Whereas the various European countries now at war have adopted such changes in time standards known as daylight saving; and

Whereas the pronounced saving in artificial lighting and in the use of fuel and the greater opportunity for recreation on the part of the people will be obtained by the adoption of daylight saving, so called: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island hereby urges upon the Congress of the United States that it pass such legislation as may achieve the desired results; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Rhode Island be, and they hereby are, requested to use their efforts to obtain the passage of said legislation, and the Secretary of State is hereby instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
PROVIDENCE.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original resolution approved by His Excellency, the governor, February 8, 1918.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Rhode Island this 11th day of February, in the year 1918.

[SEAL.]

J. FRED PARKER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have a telegram from the Chamber of Commerce of Lansing, Mich., making certain suggestions regarding the pending railroad bill, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LANSING, MICH., February 13, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Referring to the pending railroads compensation bill, the Lansing Chamber of Commerce does not feel that it is necessary and is therefore opposed to any provision that will take from the Interstate Commerce Commission and State commissions any part of the jurisdiction they now have over freight rates. We are also in favor of fixing a definite time when the control of the railroads shall again pass into the hands of their private owners and we express the hope that you will advocate amendments not inconsistent with the above.

LANSING CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I also have a series of resolutions from the Chamber of Commerce of Traverse City, Mich., bearing upon the same subject, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Board of Directors of the Traverse City Chamber of Commerce.

Whereas the Hon. William G. McAdoo, Director General of the Railroads of the United States, recently testified before a committee of the United States Senate that certain small lines of railroads which were not necessary to the Government for the conduct of war operations may be released from Federal management and control; and

Whereas preceding legislation has established no differentiation between trunk lines and the smaller lines, and has placed both the trunk lines and their feeders under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and subject to its rules and regulations, and to all Federal statutes for the regulation and control of railroads; and

Whereas the operating expenses of the said smaller lines have been largely increased to comply with the requirements of Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

Whereas release of the smaller lines from Federal operation and control will work great loss and damage to them, depreciate their credit, increase the difficulty of procuring cars to move tonnage, and bring many of them into dire financial straits; and

Whereas, under orders of the Director General of the Railroads, the right of routing freight has been taken away from the shipper and put in the hands of the railroad company with instructions that such freight must be routed via the shortest open route, which said instructions will result in the loss of certain revenue to the smaller lines, and thus increase the already severe burden placed upon them; and

Whereas the railroads of the United States form a great circulatory system, and disruption of any part of the system causes a general reduction of efficiency on the part of the entire system, as has been amply illustrated by the congestions prevailing at certain centers during the past 12 months; and

Whereas industries valuable to the Government in the prosecution of the war are located on many of the smaller lines, and any failure on the part of said lines to furnish service to said industries located on their tracks and dependent upon them will not only work a local hardship to the communities affected but will work a national hardship in delaying preparations for war: Therefore be it, and it is hereby,

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Traverse City Chamber of Commerce respectfully urges and requests that the said smaller railway lines of the United States be continued under Federal management and control in the same measure and degree as the trunk lines and be accorded the same degree of protection and credit; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of the above resolution be forwarded to the Hon. William G. McAdoo, Director General of the Railroads of the United States, and to the members of the Michigan delegation in Congress.

TRAVERSE CITY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
W. J. HOBBS, Secretary.

Mr. STERLING. I send to the desk a letter from Mr. Charles H. Eyler, secretary of the Farmers' Grain Dealers' Association of South Dakota in relation to the pending bill, and especially to that provision of the bill relating to rates. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK., February 11, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the present time Congress is asked by the administration to enact a railroad bill. Very much care should be taken to protect the shippers' interests as well as the railroads. We must concede the logic of one-man control to a certain extent in war time, but there is always danger of establishing precedent that would destroy the rights guaranteed by a republican Government.

Our association asks that the Interstate Commerce Commission retain the same jurisdiction over rates as in the past. We are more than glad as loyal Americans to bear the inconveniences of war operation of our railroads, but hope that we will have the same right of appeal to a body of disinterested men in the future as in the past.

We ask you as our representative to use your influence to have this embodied in the new law.

Very truly, yours, FARMERS' GRAIN DEALERS' ASSOCIATION,
CHAS. H. EYLER, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a letter from the secretary of the Votes for Women Club of Grand Forks, N. Dak., transmitting a resolution of the club. It is a very brief letter, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., February 11, 1918.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GRONNA: At a special meeting of the Votes for Women Club of Grand Forks, held in the city hall, Saturday evening, February 9, resolutions were passed urging our Senators at Washington to do all in their power to bring about the passage of the Federal suffrage amendment.

A special vote of thanks was passed to you for your support of the cause in the past and expressing appreciation for your work in our behalf at the present time.

Will you please present the following resolution to the United States Senate and request that it be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? We would appreciate this very much:

"Resolved, That the Votes for Women Club of Grand Forks, N. Dak., call upon the Senate of the United States to pass at once the Federal suffrage amendment, establishing at home that democracy for which the men of this country have been called to fight abroad."

We thank you very much for attending to this for us, and we would be glad to know in what issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we shall be able to find this resolution.

Very truly, yours, MARY E. MCCUMBER.
Secretary of the Votes for Women Club,
Grand Forks, N. Dak.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present a communication from the Nebraska State Railway Commission and ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINCOLN, NEBR., February 11, 1818.

Senator G. M. HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

We protest proposed basis of compensation to railroads under Government operation as excessive. Railway operating income plus income from other sources give percentage returns on capitalization of three principal roads in this State as follows: North Western, 12.04; Union Pacific, 14.14; Burlington, 25.63. Suggest limitation to regular dividends of last three years. By all means, strike words "reasonable compensation" from first section of bill. They surrender all that has been gained in rate regulation. We also protest giving the President power to initiate or make rates; should be left where it now is.

NEBRASKA STATE RAILWAYS COMMISSION.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of John E. Perley, jr., Post, No. 37, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Hampshire, of Laconia, N. H., praying for an increase in the pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Pacific Coast Division of the Bohemian National Alliance, praying for the liberation and unification of their race in Bohemia after the war is ended, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CLOTHING FOR AMERICAN SOLDIERS IN FRANCE.

Mr. SWANSON. There has been some difference of opinion disclosed in the discussion as to the supply of clothing to our soldiers in France. I have a letter which gives specific information on that subject from a most eminent and respectable citizen of Norfolk, and I desire that the portion of it appertaining to that subject may be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NORFOLK, VA., February 13, 1818.

Hon. CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having repeatedly read in the public prints statements made by certain persons in the Senate and House regarding our troops not being supplied with proper clothing, etc., I avail myself of the opportunity of quoting you an extract from a letter just received from my nephew to his mother.

His regiment, the Eleventh United States Engineers, joined the English battle line, and he is now in a hospital from a wound received in the fight:

"I am sorry you are shipping some underclothes, as you write, because I have tried to tell you that I did not want them. I have no place to keep them and much less any use for them. We are issued all that we can possibly need, and we can't throw away issued ones when they are dirty, as they all have to be accounted for."

OFFICERS' ALLOWANCES IN THE FIELD.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am receiving quite a number of letters with reference to commutation affecting the officers of the Army. I see the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs here, and I wish to ask him a question for information that I may use in writing to people interested.

It is stated that under the law and custom of the military department officers are in effect penalized when they go to the front. In other words, it is suggested that, taking two men, each of them a colonel, located here at Washington City, they are given an allowance of $12 a room for seven rooms. In other words, they receive $84 a month as room rent, we might say. Then, if Col. A is taken from here to the trenches in France he loses that allowance, his family are not furnished quarters, and whatever expense is necessary to get them quarters he must pay out of his own pocket. In other words, he is penalized for going to the front, while Col. B, who stays here, continues to draw this allowance.

I wish to ask the chairman of the Military Committee if that is correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it is substantially correct as the Senator has stated.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply want to suggest that I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will take care of a situation like that. It seems to me that it is very unfair and very unjust.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that after the Senator talked to me about this matter yesterday I looked into the question and had prepared a statement that I desire to submit to the Senate and have placed in the RECORD. The statement will show what the officer is required to furnish at his own expense under the regulations of the department and the estimated cost of each item.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest to the Senator that my inquiry does not go to the uniforms at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am going further. I was going to elucidate that, but I wanted to show the Senator what the expenses were.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad to have that information, too.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In addition to that, I have had prepared the monthly pay of an officer with troops and the monthly pay of an officer in Washington, the difference in salary, and the percentage of reduction, so that it will give the Senator the information he asks for.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It covers the allowances, and so on?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Commutation of quarters, heat, and light?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We will take, by way of illustration, a second lieutenant. His monthly pay when he is in the line with the troops is $141.67. His monthly pay in Washington, because of commutation of quarters, is $173.66, a difference of $31.99 between the salary he gets with the troops and the salary he gets here in Washington. There is a reduction of 18 per cent if he goes out to serve his country in line. The reduction varies according to rank from 18 per cent to 25 per cent. The Senator took a colonel by way of illustration. His monthly pay with the troops is $333.33. His monthly pay in Washington, which includes commutation of quarters, and so forth, is $444.14. The difference in salary, then, between active service and inactive service is $110.81, or a reduction of 25 per cent when he goes out to perform service.

The Senator himself introduced a bill to meet this situation, and the Secretary of War has also prepared a bill that will meet the condition and allow commutation of quarters in the field. That bill was acted upon by our committee this morning and will be in due course reported out. So I think that will answer the question which the Senator asked, and will meet the situation. The statement referred to is as follows:

"List of articles and the minimum cost of each a dismounted Army officer is required to have by section 4, 'Regulations for the Uniform of the United States Army' (Special Regulations, No. 41), and 'Information as to Uniform and Equipment for Officers in France,' headquarters of American Expeditionary Forces November 16, 1917. "At least one-half of an officer's equipment must be replaced each year, and the above list does not consider 'dress' equipment for town wear. Officers also are required to furnish their own food, which adds about $32.50 a month to the above; he also must have bed linen, and his laundry bill will approximate $5 a month.

"I herewith submit a table of salaries of officers on duty with troops in the field and the comparative salaries of officers on duty in Washington, the latter receiving commutation of quarters, heat, and light, which is not paid to officers on duty with troops, which shows that officers on duty with troops in the United States receive from 18 to 25 per cent less than officers of like grade on duty in Washington. Officers on foreign duty receive an additional 10 per cent. Officers with troops in this instance are considered to be on duty at Camp Meade, Md., a few miles distant:

Grade.	Monthly pay with troops.	Monthly pay, Washington.	Difference in salary.	Per cent reduction.
Second lieutenant	$141.67	$173.66	$31.99	18
First lieutenant	166.67	212.79	46.12	22

Colonel	333.33	444.14	110.81	25
Brigadier general	500.00	614.01	114.01	19
Major general	666.66	794.36	127.70	19

"It must be remembered that the United States Army officers on duty with troops in the field must provide quarters and subsistence for their dependents in town, as they are not allowed to have them at cantonments or in the field, as well as officers on duty in town, and it is an established fact that such an arrangement is much more expensive than living with one's family.

"Attention also is invited to the fact that Army officers are to-day paid under a schedule framed in 1908 and under conditions existing at that time. Government statisticians have estimated that since 1913 alone living expenses have increased more than 43 per cent.

"The Judge Advocate General of the Army has held that the act of Congress of February, 1907, contemplated the payment to officers of the Army of $12 per month for each room they did not receive from the Government or were furnished by the Government to live in under a schedule which provided that a general should be furnished 11 rooms; a lieutenant general, 10; major general, 9; brigadier general, 8; colonel, 7; lieutenant colonel, 6; major, 5; captain, 4; first lieutenant, 3; and a second lieutenant, 2 rooms. To this it was provided that officers should receive heat and light or be paid in lieu thereof a sum based on climatic conditions.

"Congress, in adopting the pay schedule of May, 1908, which is the governing factor in the computation of officers' salaries at present, had before it the former schedule, and, it is understood, purposely made the salaries of officers low that they might receive the commutation for quarters, heat, and light.

"Many officers have been compelled to resign, I am advised, since the outbreak of war because they could not support themselves and families on the salary received, and many others, whose services would be of inestimable value to the country in the present crisis, have refused to don the uniform for the same reason."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am very glad the committee has acted. I know the committee has been very busy, and it has not been because it did not recognize the situation that it has not acted before. I have received quite a number of letters in reference to the matter and I wanted to get the facts.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, in this connection I might say that in the closing days of the special session, either in the first few days of October or the last few days of September, I introduced an amendment to the war-risk insurance bill providing for the payment of commutation of quarters just as is provided for in this bill. I went to the Secretary of War at that time and urged the acceptance of that principle. At that time he was very much opposed to it and declined to give it his approval and the influence of the department was exerted against it when my amendment was considered.

At this time the Secretary of War has changed his view evidently, and he is not only in favor of the allowance but sends to the committee a letter three or four pages in length in which he employs exactly the argument that I employed to him several months ago in endeavoring to get him to accept the principle. I was in favor of it then, and I am in favor of it now.

I very much hope that the bill will pass when it is considered, because I think it eminently just, but in the meantime these officers have been without this just allowance for at least five months, when they might have had it had that amendment been accepted at the time it was offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further petitions or memorials, reports of committees are in order.

QUARTERS OR COMMUTATION TO COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a report (No. 270), accompanied by a bill (S. 3863), to provide quarters or commutation thereof to commissioned officers in certain cases, which was read twice by its title.

WAR CABINET AND DIRECTOR OF MUNITIONS.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have delayed making any comments in the Senate relating to the examination of the operations of the War Department until the investigation, which was undertaken in December, had been substantially completed. I now wish to submit some remarks in advocacy of the constructive legislation proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs as a result of its investigations—the war-cabinet bill and the bill providing a centralized head of purchasing. In order to make these comments intelligently, it seems to me I can not do otherwise than point out to the Senate some of the reasons for proposing this legislation and why members of the committee believe these bills should pass.

Before the convening of Congress in December, and since the beginning of the war, members of the committee have received a great number of complaints and criticisms against the manner in which the War Department was conducting the preparations for our participation in this great conflict. Naturally complaints have come to all Senators, but a much greater number have come to members of the Committee on Military Affairs. These complaints can be divided into three classes: First, those coming from disappointed contractors or seekers for Government work. Second, those coming from young men who have enlisted or been drafted into the military service and who found themselves living under conditions to which they were unused, unfamiliar, and to which they did not readily adjust themselves. Third, those criticisms which seemed on their face to furnish evidence of a failure on the part of some one to do something which should have been done.

No member of the committee expected to find perfection in the operations of the War Department under the trying conditions existing during the past 10 months It was not humanly possible to take the military organization we had at the beginning of the war, expand it to many times its original size, and bring it to what it is to-day without making mistakes. The same thing would be true of any enterprise of a business character, for anyone familiar with business operations must realize that the failure of individuals to comprehend a situation or measure up to it necessarily means mistakes in carrying out even the best digested plans. I do not place any great reliance on individual failures or cases indicating errors due to the human equation, but when such failures are of sufficient number in any particular activity to demonstrate a lack of proper planning, coordination, systematic effort, or careful supervision, then they become an indictment of that particular activity.

The question will naturally be asked: Could not and would not these mistakes be corrected without an investigation by a congressional committee? My answer would be that undoubtedly changes for the better would be and have been made in some instances; in fact, I know of many changes experience has demonstrated as desirable, and those changes are being made from time to time whenever the requirement develops. But it should be said further in answer to that inquiry that it is always more difficult for the person or organization conducting an activity to see mistakes than for others to do so. The reason for this is that a manager is naturally prejudiced in favor of the policy followed as a result of his judgment, and he inherently feels it incumbent upon him to defend his action against any criticism. This is well illustrated by an interrogatory made of the Secretary of War at one of the hearings of the Military Committee. When asked if there were things undertaken or carried on by his department since the beginning of the war which could have been done better he replied somewhat flippantly, in effect, that he did not know all the men in the world and therefore could not pass on their capabilities. When he appeared before the committee the second time, the Secretary had modified this position, for he said:

> And we look back over the past and realize that there have been delays and that there have been shortcomings; that there have been things which might have been done better. In so great an enterprise it is impossible for frankness not to find those things.

Undoubtedly the second statement is exactly correct. I want to repeat that many improvements have been made in the operations of the department during the last 10 months, but at the same time it is impossible to expect a department whose head makes such a statement as the one to which I first referred to make many changes which an outside investigation have shown to be necessary, for his answer is in effect an omnibus apology.

It has been charged that the action taken by the committee resulted from personal or political bias, and the committee has even been criticized for taking officers and officials from their normal employment for examination purposes. I think it is proper for me to say that never in my experience in the House of Representatives or the Senate have I seen a congressional investigation so devoid of partisanship, so little, in fact, that it was negligible up to the time the proposed bills were introduced. There has been no attempt or desire to crucify anyone or anything. On the contrary, the investigation has been conducted upon the principle that the people have a right to examine and regulate the administration of their Government, and that they should exercise that right whenever it seemed best for them to do so. Speaking for myself, I wish to say that I am in favor of a continuation of the exercise of that right whenever anything incident to the war, or otherwise, develops which seems to justify an investigation; and evidently the Secretary of War is in agreement with that position, for he said at his second appearance before the committee:

> I do not need to urge that your committee, that the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House, that every citizen in this country, official and unofficial, from the highest to the lowest, realize that this is their enterprise, not quite so much as it is mine in the sense of responsibility, but their enterprise, and to ask from you and from them every suggestion, every criticism, every constructive thought that occurs to any of you, and I ask you when shortcomings are pointed out to you, whether they be well founded or whether they be not well founded, that you will instantly convey them to me, so that by the processes which the department has I may search out where blame is to be attached, where remedies are to be applied, and where strengthening and improvement of the organization are possible.

That is exactly the position of the committee, and I submit to the Senate that that could not be done satisfactorily unless the committee examined these complaints, sifted out those which had no sound basis, and presented the balance of them to the department, either through recommendation of legislation or in some other way. Incidentally, I may say, that a great many of the suggestions developed as a result of the committee hearings have been adopted or are in process of adoption by the War Department at this time.

The committee has not found everything wrong in the War Department; it has found many things to commend, and it should be a just cause of pride to all of us that so much has been accomplished in the preparation of our armies to take their place at the front. To a considerable extent, this is due to the ready response made by the high-class business men of the country, who rallied to the support of the Government in the emergency following the declaration of war on Germany and have performed, frequently under most trying circumstances, most important and absolutely essential service. I do not believe the affairs of the War Department could have been conducted with anything like the same degree of success if these men had not come to the rescue of the Government. I refer particularly, of course, to the advisory commission and its many subcommittees.

Neither would it be fair to unreservedly criticize the many activities conducted by officers of our Army. I shall refer to some of them in a critical way, but I want to say that in dealing with matters with which they are familiar, and which their military training has qualified them to conduct, the officers of the Regular Army have performed their duties well. I have no doubt a more thorough investigation of many other bureaus of the Army would demonstrate the same thing.

Neither do I wish to unjustly or unreservedly criticize the head of the War Department. He has had to deal with a multitude of questions during his incumbency, the disposal of many of which heartily meet my approval. It would require too much time to enumerate the favorable comments I might make. The Secretary has done that effectively in his speech made to the committee on January 28, 1918. No investigation would have been undertaken if there had not been criticism, and it was to find out whether such criticisms were justified and whether corrections could be made to better the service that led the committee to undertake the investigation. If I were to criticize the Secretary of War personally, it would be that he has undertaken to do too many things himself, some of which, at least, might have been attended to by subordinates, and that he has been too open to access to people who might have had their needs provided for through some subordinate officer, leaving him too little time to deliberate over the many larger problems coming before his department. If I were to make a further criticism, it would relate to his temperamental relationship to war. Doubtless he himself would admit that he is a pacifist by nature. For example, he is even now opposed to universal military training, one of the benefits we ought to get out of the great sacrifices we are making; and I can not divorce myself from the conclusion, based on his own testimony, that he has been inclined to plan for the prosecution of the war—and this condition has to some degree permeated the department—on the basis that we are 3,000 miles from the front instead of hastening preparation with all the vigor we would exercise if our borders were the battle front.

ORDNANCE BUREAU.

During its investigations the committee has examined officers of the Ordnance Bureau, officers and civilians connected with the Quartermaster's Bureau, the office of the Surgeon General, the Aviation Service, and some other less important branches of the military service. I think it proper to call to the attention of the Senate a few of the salient features of the results of this examination. The Bureau of Ordnance for the last 16 years has had at its head one of the ablest officers in the Army. Speaking personally, I have had a great admiration for Gen. Crozier. He was promoted to the rank of brigadier general and placed at the head of the Ordnance Bureau because of his generally recognized fitness, and in most respects he has borne out the prophecy of his early career. It is not his fault that much earlier action was not taken to provide a larger amount of artillery than we now have. It is true that even if the recommendations he has so many times made had been adopted we would still have been in a weaker position than we should, but his record shows that he has frequently urged appropriations for the Ordnance Bureau very much larger than his immediate superiors in the department or Congress have been willing to grant. The truth is, as he states himself, the fault is with the country, which has not always been correctly informed and has been inclined to listen to the arguments of those statesmen who have been, during the past 25 years, figuring how much highway or some other local improvement could be constructed from the appropriation to build a battleship or furnish the War Department with suitable artillery. It can not be denied that the failure of the many attempts to properly prepare the country for war when the sentiment of the country was not sufficiently favorable to do so is now costing us an expenditure of billions of dollars which might have been saved if a systematic, thoughtfully carried out program had been followed and our action based to some degree on the military preparations of other Governments, for the money expended in normal times would have provided a much larger return. Now exorbitant prices must be paid for everything required to provide for the present emergency.

Having said this much in justification of Gen. Crozier's position—and I might say more—I feel that it is necessary to call to the attention of the Senate some of the conditions for which he is partially responsible. At the beginning of the war the Government owned about 600,000 Springfield rifles and about 180,000 Krag rifles, for which latter there was no suitable ammunition; in fact, such Krag ammunition as we had was very old and probably dangerous. The Springfield rifle is of the highest type, and, speaking roughly, it is probably fair to say there is no better rifle in the world, although it has not the longest range; but I do not think the range of the rifles used in the present war has any material influence on results. The question which immediately developed, however, was with reference to an additional supply of rifles sufficient to meet our needs. I think those responsible may properly be criticized for their conclusion in this matter.

The War Department found it necessary to adopt one of two courses—either continue the manufacture of the Springfield type or take advantage of the facilities for manufacturing rifles developed in this country as a result of the European war and adopt the rifle used by Great Britain, or some modification of it. The ammunition used by the British is not like our Springfield ammunition, and that is also true of the French ammunition. It was finally decided to manufacture the Lee-Enfield rifle, the one being made in the United States for Great Britain, but changing it so that our ammunition could be used. Before the necessary changes could be made two months had passed, and supplying our Army with rifles has been delayed by at least that time. I think I will show that the delay has been much longer than two months. It is true that it is absolutely essential that an army should use but one kind of small-arm ammunition, but the question naturally arises whether it would not have been better to have manufactured the Lee-Enfield British type for service abroad and use the Springfield rifles we had on hand for training purposes at our camps. If this had been done, we would have supplied our Army with rifles in a much shorter time.

Small arms are manufactured in two Government arsenals, and by running them in two shifts of 10 hours a day they have a combined maximum capacity of about twelve hundred rifles per day. I wish to recall to the Senate that on August 29, 1916—the national defense act was passed in June—an appropriation was made for the manufacture of rifles and pistols, which justified running to their full capacity both of our armories. The one at Rock Island, Ill., had been closed down, and the other at Springfield, Mass., was manufacturing only about 75 rifles a day. After the passage of this appropriation bill, an order was given to start up these foundries, but so ineffectively was it carried out that the Rock Island Arsenal, which had been closed down, did not turn out a single rifle until June 23, 1917, or almost a year after the national defense act was passed and 10 months after the appropriation was made for that purpose. In the meantime there had been a slight increase in the output of the Springfield Arsenal, but when we declared war the total output from the latter arsenal was comparatively small.

British rifles had been manufactured in this country at Eddystone, Pa.; Ilion, N. Y.; and New Haven, Conn.; and as soon as the change in type could be made these foundries commenced turning out the Lee-Enfield rifle, so modified that our ammunition could be used. While manufacturing for the British Government these foundries had attained a combined capacity of 6,000 rifles a day. Two months before we declared war they had commenced reducing the number of their employees in proportion to the completion of the work they then had in hand, and as it required something over two months to entirely complete their British contracts, they did not succeed in turning out anything like their full capacity of the new type rifles until very recently. If they had been immediately employed to turn out the British rifle at the rate of 6,000 a day from the time we declared war, we would now have practically 1,800,000 rifles of that type, which, with the 600,000 Springfields on hand for drill and target purposes in this country, would have been amply sufficient to arm all of our forces with the required number of rifles. There were some questions relating to our ammunition, which were arguments in favor of making the change, but all of these arguments in favor of the change did not commence to overcome the advantage of immediately providing the largest supply of rifles possible—a rifle which has served England satisfactorily during three years of actual warfare.

I have discussed this matter in considerable detail, because it illustrates the point I wish to make relative to the management of the Ordnance Bureau. Its head had been engaged in technical matters all his life. He had constantly sought—justifiably so in ordinary times—for the best the market could produce, and in this case he was unwilling to modify that standard of perfection even though a modification would have greatly hastened the production of a satisfactory arm and one which would have answered all our purposes.

In order that the Senate may be fully informed upon this subject, I shall give the number of rifles which have been produced since our declaration of war up to and including December 31, 1917:

Manufactured at the Springfield Armory	87,324, or	350 per day.
Manufactured at the Rock Island Arsenal (from June 23, 1917, when the first delivery was made)	17,060, or	115 per day.
Manufactured by the Eddystone Co	128,124, or	500 per day.
Manufactured by the Winchester Co	78,538, or	300 per day.
Manufactured by the Remington Arms Co	34,414, or	100 per day.
Total output	345,460, or	1,365 per day.

During that time, if we had continued the manufacture of the British rifle, we could have manufactured at least 6,000 a day, a total of about 1,500,000, or more than four times as many as were actually produced, all of which shows that not only was two months lost in making changes necessary to permit the use of American ammunition, but it has taken many months to reach a quantity production equal to the capacity of these plants when we engaged in war.

The result of delays incident to preparation immediately before the war and in commencing our activities after the declaration of war in matters relating to machine guns, light artillery, and middle heavies is even more deplorable than that relating to small arms. The national-defense act of June, 1916, provided for a five-year program in the manufacture of ordnance, and included an appropriation of $12,000,000 for machine guns, but it was not until December 14 that 4,000 Vickers guns, tripods, and spare parts were ordered, and not until April, 1917, that 1,300 Lewis guns were ordered. I do not intend to discuss the long-drawn-out controversy about the Lewis gun. Possibly Gen. Crozier is right in his claim that the gun did not function satisfactorily until after our declaration of war, but it had been used during the previous two years by the English to good advantage, and it was very easy to obtain evidence that the gun was giving satisfaction. There is a very considerable plant in the United States at Utica, N. Y., engaged in the manufacture of these guns, and I think that plant should have been enlarged without delay and as many guns as possible turned out at once, even if a better gun would be provided later on. Incidentally, we have lost a great deal of time in changing this plant, which was manufacturing guns for British ammunition, to manufacture a gun to use American ammunition. After many trials and investigations it was decided to manufacture Lewis guns for aircraft purposes, and orders were given for these guns late in the fall of last year, but no Lewis guns are even now being manufactured for ground service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption just at that point?

Mr. WEEKS. I shall be very glad to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It so happens that three days ago I visited the Savage Arms plant at Utica, and I spent three hours in going through it. That plant is now turning out 100 Lewis machine guns per day, an average rate of 3,000 per month. That production might have been started earlier in the summer.

Mr. WEEKS. That illustrates very clearly, Mr. President, the point that I am trying to make. We delayed giving orders for our equipment and failed to take advantage of all the facilities available to furnish it.

It was finally decided to manufacture for ground service what is known as the Browning gun, an untried weapon in actual service, but a gun which promises well in the tests that have been made. None of these rifles, however, can be delivered until March of this year, and those of the heavier Browning type not until May of 1918. It is absolutely essential that infantry regiments in these days have a very considerable number of machine-gun companies, and our troops will be handicapped more or less by this failure to act promptly in providing some kind of machine gun. I will put in the RECORD at this point a table showing the number of machine guns we had on hand at the beginning of the war—a pitiful showing:

Two hundred and eighty-two Marlin automatic machine guns, caliber .30, model of 1904.
One hundred and forty-eight Colt machine guns, caliber .30.
Three hundred and sixty-three Lewis machine guns, caliber .503.
Six hundred and sixty-six Benét-Mercié machine rifles, model of 1909.

Although we have had a very good 3-inch gun in the United States it was decided to adopt the French 75-mm. gun. I will put in the record at this time a table showing the number of guns and carriages we had on hand at the beginning of the war, including the 4.7 howitzers—another pitiful showing:

3-inch guns and carriages	528
4.7-inch guns and carriages	64
6-inch howitzers and carriages	8
3.8-inch howitzers and carriages	28
4.7-inch howitzers and carriages	108
3.8-inch guns and carriages	8
2.95-inch mountain guns and carriages	80

I want to particularly call attention to the delays incident to undertaking this work. I have already called attention to the time when the order was given to manufacture the Vickers and Lewis guns. The orders for other heavier artillery were not given until some time subsequent. Gen. Crozier testified that he was delayed somewhat by lack of appropriations, which were made in June, 1917, but he also testified that no attempt was made to use any part of the hundred millions of dollars of the emergency fund given the President until August, 1917, or perhaps in the month of September, when $35,000,000 was placed at the disposal of the Ordnance Bureau. That enabled making the contracts before the appropriation bill of October, 1917, was passed.

The natural query coming to one's mind after examining all this testimony in detail is why there should have been any material delay after the declaration of war in making contracts to carry out the program authorized in the national defense act? It will be remembered that this was provided in five parts. Preparations had to be made for placing the activities for the first part, and they had been placed, so that by multiplying that by four it would not seem that it would have taken any particular time to take the next step; and yet months passed—precious months, as has been demonstrated by the unpreparedness of our troops.

During the examination the chairman of the committee asked this question:

And yet between the appropriations of 1916 and June, 1917, practically nothing was done toward construction. I am still not satisfied with the explanation you made about the delay.

Gen. CROZIER. Senator, what I shall have to say to you, then, is that I am not satisfied either, and I was not satisfied at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was responsible?

Gen. CROZIER. The Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. Somebody is responsible, and I want to find out who.

Gen. CROZIER. The Secretary of War has to be responsible. That is to say, the program of treatment of the subject of machine guns, coming finally to the test of May, 1917, was a program which was adopted by the War Department; it was prescribed by the Secretary of War, who took a personal interest in the subject, and was not the program of the Ordnance Department.

I need not dwell longer on this subject than to refer to the dates when orders were given for the manufacture of the different classes of artillery with which our Army is to be provided, and I wish to insert in my remarks a list of the contracts and the dates on which these contracts were made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEEKS. As a further comment of delays which have taken place, about 5,000 of the 75-mm. guns and carriages have been ordered. Small orders were placed throughout the summer, but the main order to the Willys-Overland Co., for 2,927, was not made until December 1, 1917. The same thing is generally true of other guns and gun parts. For instance, the largest order for 3-inch carriage limbers was given to the American Car & Foundry Co. on November 5, 1917. Nearly three-fourths of the 75-mm. gun caissons were provided for in an order on the same date, November 5, 1917, and so on down through the list. Instead of being made in May and June, or possibly in July, these contracts were very largely made in November, many of them as late as December. It seems to me that a realization of the necessity to have acted promptly would have produced a very different result.

It is true that testimony has been submitted to show that we have made arrangements with France for artillery of various calibers for the year 1918, and it is represented that this arrangement was suggested by the French Government. Whether or not this is so, on account of the delays to which I have briefly referred we could not have provided any considerable amount of artillery for ourselves before the end of this year. But even under these circumstances it seems to me to be very doubtful wisdom to have to depend on France, where there must be an active demand for the employment of every mechanic in providing the requirements in that country. We have a much larger supply of labor than either England or France, especially skilled labor, and it should not have been necessary for us to depend on those countries for this assistance, or, at least, to nothing like the extent we find it necessary.

One of the most acute and dangerous situations developed by the committee's investigation relates to providing a suitable supply of powder.

I want to say, Mr. President, that in all cases where officials of the department or officers of the Army appeared before the committee they were advised that if there were anything of a confidential character in their testimony which should not be included in the public record it should be reserved for executive session. As far as it is possible for me to do so I have limited the citations I shall make to the public record, because it would be manifestly unwise to discuss a confidential matter on the floor of the Senate. I say that at this time because the powder situation is one that can not be discussed in great detail, and I have left out all figures in my reference to it.

Powder can not be readily obtained in England. France, or Italy; indeed, those countries have been, and are at present, drawing on the United States for their supplies. It would not be justifiable, in my opinion, for me to give detailed figures relating to this subject, but I can say without impropriety that about half of the capacity to manufacture in the United States is under contract to our allies, and our total capacity is not more than half our probable needs for the year 1918. Yet no definite step was taken to provide this additional capacity until the month of December, when construction of one unit of an additional supply was undertaken, and within 10 days the construction of another unit was also undertaken. However, if both of these units were in full operation and we had full use of the present capacity, we would still probably be providing for less powder than we will need this year. Of course, the correctness of this statement depends somewhat on the number of troops we have in action.

I can not state too strongly my impression based on the testimony submitted to the committee that there has been gross neglect in providing this absolute requirement, a neglect which would be almost fatal to our war plans if they were not also hampered by the shipping situation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask whether Congress had provided the money necessary for securing the amount of powder that we needed?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not recall in detail the appropriations; but the Senator from Michigan will remember that we provided in the spring of 1917, before the declaration of war, an appropriation of $100,000,000 for emergency purposes, and, substantially speaking, that appropriation was not expended; so that the money was available for such purposes as the construction of powder plants, purchase of ordnance, or any similar use.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I assume that the Senator means the $100,000,000 which was given to the President?

Mr. WEEKS. I am speaking of that now. I do not remember about the detailed appropriation for powder in the appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. The $100,000,000 was to be controlled by the President?

Mr. WEEKS. Absolutely; and there is nothing on record to show that any request was made for a part of this fund for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WEEKS. I do; yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was a member of the Appropriations Committee at the time. My memory is that the appropriations asked for by the department for powder and other Army supplies were always granted.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it would have been the height of folly to have failed to grant a request of the department for funds to provide powder. I can not imagine that any Senator would interpose an objection of any kind to such a request.

It must be remembered that powder plants can not be constructed in a few months. It requires many months, and we can not expect supplies from the plants now under construction until the campaign of this year has been well advanced, and then only a moderate quantity; indeed, these plants will not be able to operate to their full capacity this calendar year.

A similar conclusion is justified in the failure to provide chlorine, toluol, and other absolutely necessary materials. The testimony, however, is much too confidential to discuss on the floor of the Senate.

QUARTERMASTER BUREAU.

The examination made by the committee of the Quartermaster Bureau developed that much excellent work had been done, but many failures, which might have been avoided, were made. The head of that bureau has labored under the disadvantage of not being a trained quartermaster, but a commissary, with which service he had been connected until the amalgamation of the Paymaster, Quartermaster, and Commissary Departments a few years ago. In the particular line in which he has been trained too much praise can not be given him. I think it fair to say that there is no substantial complaint against the food furnished the Army; indeed, I have not heard or seen a complaint which could not be directly charged to some local condition, and the rationing of our men has, on the whole, been a tremendous success. Gen. Sharpe is entitled to the credit for this result.

The purchasing of supplies, however, has not in all respects been handled satisfactorily, and would have been distinctly otherwise, in my opinion, if it had not been for the assistance rendered by the Committee on Supplies; but that assistance involved complications—differences between the Quartermaster's Bureau and the Committee on Supplies—and in many cases a failure to obtain good results. It ought to be said, however, that there has been an enormous enlargement in the number of officers connected with both the Ordnance and Quartermaster's Bureaus, and that, necessarily, it took time to secure suitable men and train them for their duties. But the same delay in getting under way and in giving contracts is found in the Quartermaster Department that I have instanced in connection with the activities of the Ordnance Bureau. For example—and I will only give one instance, because it is typical—it was, of course, known as soon as war was declared that overcoats for the entire number of men enlisted or drafted would be required before the cold weather, and yet contracts for but 152,000 overcoats were made in April, but 50,000 in May, and, in addition to that, about a million and a half between the 1st of June and the 1st of September. The deliveries of these overcoats, however, were put at such dates that they could not possibly have been received in time to even furnish a million men with overcoats before cold weather. For example, 1,632 were to be delivered in May, 15,700 in June, 80,000 in July, 150,000 in August, 350,000 in September, 340,000 in October, 170,000 in November, and 250,000 in December, or a total of 1,357,332, or less overcoats than we had men in the service on the 1st of January of this year. This indicates that some of our men, either those under arms or those in the noncombatant forces, could not possibly have been supplied with overcoats in time to prevent the suffering which has undoubtedly resulted from this neglect.

Senators should recall that men doing duty at night require overcoats during the month of September in almost all sections of the country. It is not safe to say that even if these overcoats had been supplied before the 1st of December there would not have been suffering on account of failure to furnish them earlier.

This illustration is not unlike others which may be instanced; in fact, technicalities of one kind or another prevented our using all the facilities we had at hand. Great clothing centers were not employed in the slightest degree in manufacturing clothing for the Army. Not a contract was let in Rochester, N. Y., or in Newark, N. J., which are among the most important clothing centers in the United States. I do not find that any contract of any considerable amount was let to a manufacturer of clothing west of the Allegheny Mountains. There were some small purchases to make up our requirements made in a few western cities, but there were not more than 50,000 overcoats purchased from these sources. If there had been a planning board to give consideration to the letting of these contracts, they would have been distributed throughout the country, especially in those places where other work was not being done, and where labor could easily be obtained and properly housed.

The experience of the American Uniform Co., of New York, is not unlike that of many other manufacturers. This concern, which had manufactured 500,000 uniforms for the British Army within a period of 60 days, and had ample capital and suitable facilities for doing the work, was refused contracts on account of technicalities which seem almost absurd when we consider that our men, as a result of such neglect, failed to receive warm clothing before the cold weather came on. In their endeavors to obtain a contract, which was finally refused on the ground of insufficient capital, although they had one of the best lists of stockholders, containing many men of very high financial rating, and a capital of $750,000, they were hampered in every way. To give an example of the situation, I quote what took place at the quartermaster's office in New York. The representative of the company received this information in reply to interrogatories by the manager of the uniform company. The quartermaster said:

> The uniform company must own the shops. I asked him if this meant to own the building in which the shops were located. He said no, but that a lease from the landlord of the building would be required. I asked him whether this would not be satisfied by taking a lease from the present tenant, and he said that he would look on this with disfavor. I then asked him if the uniform company must own the machinery in the shop. He said yes. I pointed out that in some cases special machinery was leased. He said that in such cases a lease direct from the licensing company would be required. I asked him whether there was any objection to leasing the machinery from the present owner of the shop, and he said that he would look on this with disfavor.

In other words, instead of stretching a point to get a large manufacturer interested in making uniforms, every possible obstacle was placed in the way of the company receiving a contract. Whether there was personal animosity or other similar reason I am not able to say; but it is pretty nearly a disgraceful development that every attempt was not made to get our men warmly clad before the winter weather.

This uniform question brings out the most unsavory development which has taken place since the investigation commenced.

I feel that inasmuch as there has been so much comment in the press regarding this matter, I should bring it to the attention of the Senate. It is known as the Base Sorting Plant arrangement. In its inception undoubtedly the method used was wise, because the Government was furnishing the cloth from which the uniforms were to be made, and there was a natural desire that the clippings belonging to the Government should be used for governmental purposes; but in connection with carrying out this arrangement—and perhaps he was its promoter—there appeared on the scene one Samuel Kaplan, of New York, who soon became connected with the committee on supplies and within a very short time—not much more than a week, according to the evidence—obtained a contract for the sorting of these rags at 6 cents a pound, the contract being let to the Base Sorting Co., of New York, a company organized for this purpose with a capital of $50,000, of which $10,000 was paid in. One of the three active men in the Base Sorting Co. was a brother of Kaplan. Other rag dealers soon became active and insistent that a suitable arrangement had not been made, and the result was a modification of the contract so that only a half a cent a pound profit should be paid to the Base Sorting Plant. Later on, the agitation being continued and those connected with the company evidently becoming frightened, they offered to do the sorting for nothing; and in December, as a result of an investigation made by the Equipment Bureau, the Secretary of War canceled the contract altogether.

At the time this contract was made there was another contract let, which presumably has also been canceled——

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I will ask him if he has noted in the press the dismissal from service in the Army of the officer who interfered with the contract?

Mr. WEEKS. I read that in the morning paper. I was going to refer to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit an interruption, I noticed that article myself this morning, and as the result of it I have addressed a letter to the Secretary of War asking for particulars connected with the dismissal of Capt. Pereless, with a hope that I may be able to lay the information before the Senate to-morrow morning.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Who gave the first contract at 6 cents a pound to Kaplan?

Mr. WEEKS. The committee on supplies. Kaplan, while not a member of that committee, was a member of the subcommittee of the committee on supplies.

Mr. LODGE. Who was at the head of the commission?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Eisenman. I should say that Mr. Rosenwald, of the Sears, Roebuck Co., a member of the advisory commission, is the chairman of the committee on supplies. Mr. Eisenman, of Cleveland, Ohio, is the vice chairman of the committee on supplies and had this particular matter in charge.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator state how long the contract ran at which 6 cents a pound was paid?

Mr. WEEKS. It was an indefinite contract, as I remember, but contained the usual provision made in Army contracts permitting its cancellation.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does not quite understand me. How long a time did this arrangement continue before it was changed from 6 cents a pound to half a cent a pound?

Mr. WEEKS. It continued two or three months, as I recall.

Mr. GALLINGER. Could the Senator state approximately how large the profit received was?

Mr. WEEKS. I shall do so, because I want the Senate to know the facts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator would like to insert it in the RECORD, I have here the data relating to that contract in a compact form.

Mr. WEEKS. I will ask unanimous consent to insert the data in the RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can read it in this connection.

Mr. WEEKS. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. July 26 Mr. Eisenman sent to the Quartermaster's Department a letter from Kaplan giving plans for Government control of clippings.

August 9 Eisenman recommended raising the profit from one-half cent per pound to 1 cent per pound.

August 21 Eisenman was advised that a company had been formed, with Mr. Ira A. Kaplan as president.

August 22 the contract was signed.

September 13 Eisenman left contracts for sale of condemned clothing and blankets to Base Sorting Plant for execution with the Quartermaster General.

September 20 the contract was signed.

November 14 one of the dissatisfied rivals, Mr. Leuthner, called the attention of the Secretary of War to the fact that the contract was outrageous and would result in a profit of $400,000 on clippings. The Quartermaster's Department immediately began to investigate.

December 3 Eisenman sent a proposed supplementary contract reducing the profit on clippings back to one-half cent per pound.

December 8 Eisenman forwarded offer from Base Sorting Plant from the same concern to cut off the other nominal one-half of 1 per cent profit.

December 19 the Quartermaster General canceled both contracts and gave the 30 days' notice to take over the plant. The testimony shows that contracts were duly entered into first at 5½ cents, then at 6½ cents, and then dropped from 6½ to 5½, from 5½ to 5, and finally when an investigation was had the contract was canceled by the War Department.

Mr. WEEKS. I was about to say when interrupted that at the time this contract was made there was another contract let which presumably has also been canceled, although the Military Committee could not seem to obtain the evidence that this had been done. This latter was a contract to take over all of the condemned material from the Army, including blankets, uniforms, overcoats, and so forth. This contract was made at 5 cents a pound. While the company was operating on the 6 cents a pound basis it made money at the rate of $400,000 a year on the first contract. It was easily demonstrated that the work could be done for 1⅝ cents a pound. If the second contract had not, or has not, been canceled, the profits, according to the testimony of Capt. Pereless, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, would run into the millions of dollars.

I do not believe that any member of the committee on supplies, referring now to Mr. Rosenwald and Mr. Eisenman, knew what it cost to sort rags, although it would seem that they should have found out before making such a contract. Certainly the rag dealers knew, and the fact that a man connected with the committee on supplies, or a subcommittee, should have been instrumental in bringing about such a contract, his brother being one of the officers of the company given the contract, another brother being connected with two comparatively small woolen mills, the only mills manufacturing for the Government which have been commandeered, and having still another brother of draft age who suddenly left the country before the passage of the draft act and who has not returned, surrounds the whole enterprise and the name with a kind of cloud which leaves an extremely bad impression. I wish to absolve, however, the committee on supplies from any responsibility in this matter, except it does seem to me that before making such a contract the committee should have learned the real cost of doing such work and made a businesslike contract.

This also brings up an important question in regard to the manner of making purchases of Army supplies. In most cases, except in contracts for shoes, the contracts were not made as a result of competition. It was claimed that conditions were such that this could not be done, but, leaving out the contracts for shoes, the total contracts made by this bureau during the months beginning with the declaration of war and up to the 1st of January aggregated about $700,000,000. It is worth noting that the Paymaster's Bureau of the Navy continued its policy of the past, and all contracts were made as a result of competition, the bureau having expended $300,000,000 without any difficulty in supplying the requirements of the Navy by following that system. While I do not claim that excessive prices were paid—indeed, it would be almost impossible to determine whether or not they were—contracting without competition is contrary to law and to every business precedent governed by prudence. It also involves some serious situations. For instance, the blankets which were furnished to the Government ranged in prices from $2.75 to $6.50. If he wishes to, one may assume that in each case the Government got its money's worth; but it can be easily assumed also that excessive prices were paid for some of these blankets, and certainly those purchased at the lower prices were of pretty poor quality. For instance, Gen. Greble, the commandant of the National Guard encampment at Fort Worth, Tex., testified that although his men had three blankets apiece they suffered exceedingly with the cold, and it was necessary to put in an emergency order to buy puffs. Twenty-five thousand were purchased for his camp. In other words, in many instances there was no standard of quality fixed or businesslike method followed in making purchases.

I wish to comment on the blanket question in passing. According to the evidence we have purchased 19,000,000 blankets. Gen. Pershing says that a man in the trenches will require nine blankets a year. Therefore if we had a million men in the trenches we have already purchased blankets enough for two years. But if the men are in camp they do not need half as many blankets as they would in the trenches. As more than half of our men up to this time and for the larger part of this year will be in camp, it would seem that we have bought blankets enough to last our forces from two to four years. That may be a wise provision in looking ahead, but, on the other hand, it must be remembered that manufacturing capacity which might have been utilized for some other purpose has been used in manufacturing blankets and quite likely delayed other necessary production. That is another point in favor of a planning board, to look ahead and determine these questions before action is taken.

It should be said that some requirements of the Government were so much greater than facilities to furnish them that competitive buying would not have been desirable. This is particularly true of the purchase of duck. The capacity of the manufacturers of this material was thirty times less than the requirements of the Government, and it was necessary to go out and develop facilities for providing this cloth. I do not intend to criticize the failure to purchase duck by competition, or of any other article where the facilities for its supply is less than the requirements of the Government.

At the first examination of the Secretary of War I, and I think others, got the impression that the camps had been supplied with all the requirements needed by the troops which had not been transferred to Europe. Later on he modified this statement by saying that the rush requirements of the troops had been supplied; but to show the extent of the failure to promptly supply troops under the program adopted by the War Department I wish to call attention to the testimony of Maj. Gen. Greble. Gen. Greble appeared before the committee December 28, 1917, and in some detail stated the failure to supply his camp at Fort Worth, Tex.

It must be remembered that this is a National Guard camp, that the National Guard was called into the service in July, and that, therefore, the testimony he gave represented conditions something like six months after his men had been mobilized. Gen. Greble, in answer to the inquiry whether his camp was properly equipped, gave this testimony:

The following is a list of present shortages expressed in percentage on the more important articles of equipment: Rifles, 59 per cent short; bayonets, 65 per cent short; pistols, 86 per cent short; cartridge belts, 59 per cent short; machine guns, none on hand (20 Colts shipped)—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What was the date?

Mr. WEEKS. December 28, 1917—automatic rifles, 88 per cent short; 3-inch guns, 88 per cent short; 6-inch howitzers, none on hand; trench mortars, none on hand; 1-pounder cannon, none on hand; Artillery harness, 92 per cent short; horse equipment, 81 per cent short; Infantry equipment (this includes haversacks, first-aid pouches, and canteens), 78 per cent short; small-arms ammunition, 75 per cent short; Artillery ammunition, 90 per cent short.

In discussing the question of other equipment he furnished us the following information:

JOHN P. HASSON,
Major of Infantry, National Army,
Division Quartermaster.

If any Senator thinks that is an individual instance and should not be given too much importance, I call to the attention of the Senate a letter, dated as late as January 13, from the captain of a company at one of the western camps. I will read a portion of it. The writer says:

I have no canteens, no ammunition belts, no haversacks, no pack carriers, no bayonets for Enfields, no automatic rifles, no grenades, no rifle grenades, no pistols, no alidades, no sketching boards, no field glasses, no gas masks.

In other words, the statement, inadvertently, I think, which has given the country the impression that these camps were fully supplied is not correct. The camps are not supplied, and very largely so because of the reason I assigned earlier in my remarks—entirely unjustifiable delays in making contracts to provide these necessities.

I think that probably this condition is an exaggeration of the shortages at many of the National Guard camps; but if this is true of a National Guard camp, how much more acute was it likely to be at a National Army camp, where the men were mobilized two months later. They had no equipment as did the National Guard before being called into the service. An examination of the dates of orders given for much of this equipment, which would have been furnished promptly if contracts had been made immediately after the declaration of war, shows the extent we have been delayed in enabling our Army to fit itself for service abroad. Many of these articles should have been furnished in their entirety early in the fall, but there were cases like that of cartridge belts, a very simple article, contracts for which were not given until long after they should have been delivered.

AVIATION.

I have suggested that the committee examined developments in the Aviation Service. On the whole, the evidence shows that this development has been carried on intelligently and systematically. While the actual number of machines constructed does not compare favorably with impressions given the public, not, perhaps, by those responsible, but by others, it is represented that from now on production will be comparatively rapid. As far as any evidence submitted to the committee shows, the motor constructed for these airplanes has met all requirements and tests. At present it would seem that if there is any failure in the development of the Aviation Service, it will be due to the supply of spruce, and I hardly think entirely satisfactory arrangements have yet been made for this purpose. I say this with a good deal of hesitation, however, because there is evidence that much less progress has been made than should have been. I want to add that we can never be sure a machine is going to work well because it does so in practical tests. There may be unsatisfactory developments in the Aviation Service which can not be foreseen at this time.

Quite likely the Military Committee will feel it incumbent on itself to follow up this particular investigation from time to time to be sure that everything is being done to provide this very important facility in waging war; in fact, from the strictly military standpoint, I believe it is the most important agency we are furnishing. I have great hopes that our supplementing the efforts of the allies in providing airplanes will have a very marked effect on the successful prosecution of the war.

MEDICAL BUREAU.

I have also referred to the examination of the Surgeon General's Office and regret that a clean bill of health can not be given this essential branch of our Military Establishment. It is one of the best illustrations that can be found to demonstrate the lack of careful planning ahead. If somebody had really been thinking about the requirements of this great emergency, it could not have been possible that the building of hospitals at the camps or cantonments would have been delayed, or, in fact, not undertaken as soon as any construction was commenced. Yet, the construction of hospitals for the National Guard divisions was not undertaken until the month of September, a considerable time after they had gone into camp, and many of them are not completed at this time. None of these hospitals have steam heat, some have no hot water, and a very considerable number have been for months lacking the commonest equipment necessary to hospital facilities. No sewerage systems in some of them, not even bedpans until very recently, and in more or less instances the rooms in which examinations of patients were made had no heat, although necessarily a man must be exposed for a considerable time during such examinations.

As I said in the beginning, I do not believe in placing any particular reliance on individual cases of neglect in such matters. Quite likely a considerable number of doctors have been taken into the service who were inexperienced and in some cases absolutely incompetent, but it is apparent that there are not enough doctors for our needs or sufficient nurses. If there were, it could not be possible that such a case as was recently brought to my attention in connection with the Walter Reed Hospital, in this city, could happen. At that hospital a man was placed in the measles-suspect ward on Sunday, removed Monday noon, and did not see a doctor again until Wednesday morning, although he was suffering acutely from a disease which should have been promptly treated.

As far as the National Guard camps are concerned, all the hospital arrangements have been delayed and neglected. Maj. Gen. Greble, commanding the Fort Worth, Tex., camp, reported to at least four officials of the War Department during the month of September that unless prompt action were taken there would be sickness and demoralization in his camp. Almost immediately afterwards he was sent to Europe, and did not return until November, but, notwithstanding his protests against these conditions, no action was taken to remedy them until the 15th of November. By that time the camp had become a vast hospital. Of the 25,000 men in this cantonment, 8,000 were at one time or another in the hospital during the month of November. The capacity of the hospital is 800 men, and at one time it had to accommodate eighteen hundred patients—a hospital with no sewerage system and lacking in pretty nearly every medical requirement. It is not surprising that there were 200 deaths within a short time at that camp and numbers of the men so inadequately treated that their recovery is a matter of weeks and months.

All of these instances are important illustrations of a failure to develop a definite plan before the men were ordered to the colors. While such failures are not by any means universal, they are of sufficient number to warrant their being brought to the attention of the public and to stimulate the officers of the War Department to correct them and prevent their recurrence; indeed, there can be no question that much of the sickness and many of the deaths at these cantonments were due to insufficient clothing and inadequate hospital facilities.

Now, I want to point out how far we have fallen behind other countries in this respect. Here is a quotation from the proceedings of the House of Commons. The undersecretary of state for war was asked about mortality, and the suggestion was made that an investigation be ordered of the condition of the troops at Salisbury Plain.

Mr. LODGE. What date was that?

Mr. WEEKS. The answer indicates that it was very recent. This is the answer of Mr. Tennant:

> The annual ratio per 1,000 was for the Salisbury Plain district during the period of September 1 to the 31st of December, 325.4 admissions to the hospital; deaths, 1.88.

That would indicate a number of deaths not exceeding 5 per thousand per year. The number of deaths at our camps exceeds 8 per thousand per year, 5 is about the ratio for men who have been examined of the age of our drafted men, and Mr. Tennant adds:

> Both those ratios are lower than those for peace time, and in those circumstances I can not see any necessity for the appointment of a committee to investigate.

TROOPS IN EUROPE.

Mr. President, the question has arisen about the number of troops we have in Europe. Of course, I am not going to say how many American troops there are in Europe, although I know, but the suggestion has been made by those in high authority that we have done very much better in this respect than we anticipated, based on plans made during the fall months. I want to say in reply to that—because I do not think it fair to give the public a wrong impression about what we are doing—that on the 1st day of October I had a conversation with the Secretary of War, who told me the number of troops we had in Europe or on the way there, what the plans of the department were, and what he believed the department could do in the future. The number of troops now in Europe is exactly 54 per cent of the number that would have been there on February 15, if those plans had been carried out. I do not say that in the way of criticism of the Secretary of War, but I do say it as an answer to the impression given the public that we have been accomplishing more in getting troops to the other side than was anticipated by the officials of the department. It is distinctly unwise to give the public such an impression. It is almost equally unwise to give the public the impression that we are doing less than we are, or hold up to criticism those things which should not be criticized; but, as far as possible, without exposing military secrets, the public should be given the truth in matters of that kind.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] yesterday, in his forceful address, in speaking of the number of troops abroad, said that we had not 30,000 men over there but many, many times that number; that we had not a hundred thousand men over there but many, many times that number. "Many" means numerous; it does not mean twice that number but several times that amount. I can say to the Senator from Kentucky and to the Senate that the word "many" does not apply to his description in any respect. When he says "many," it entirely deludes the public and is so erroneous that it should be corrected.

Incidentally, Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of interest to the Senator from Kentucky. Many of the things which he stated are true, but they had been stated more definitely by the Secretary of War in his testimony before the committee. I am glad the Secretary of War and the Senator from Kentucky said them, because they pointed out the things the War Department has done, and the Secretary of War made some explanations for the things which had not been done. It is right that the public should know that, but no one denies that our draft law has worked well, that we repaired the German ships expeditiously, or several of the other propositions the Senator from Kentucky discussed at considerable length.

He also instanced the fact that the French and British commissioners had extolled our war preparations. Does any Senator think that the commissioners from our allied countries would make public criticisms of what we were doing? If they were going to say anything—and they may have felt it incumbent upon them to do so—necessarily what they would say to us would be flattering to our vanity or, at least, would incline that way.

There was one other point raised by the Senator from Kentucky to which I desire to refer for a moment—a delicate subject which should not be discussed in detail in public. He referred to the failure of the Root mission to Russia, not with any desire to reflect on the head of that mission or any member of it, I take it, but to indicate that even as competent a man as Mr. Root had failed to obtain results. Most of us do not know about the details of our relations with foreign countries; we are not members of the Foreign Relations Committee; we can not know the facts; and we could not discuss them in public if we did; but in that particular case I want to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky, if he can do so, that he look at the files of the State Department and determine for himself whether everything was done that could have been done which would have enabled the mission headed by Mr. Root to have been successful. I think he will find that others than the members of the Root mission were responsible, at least to some degree, for the failure of the success of that mission.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, that is a very modest statement; but the Senator leaves it in a very indefinite situation. I was almost tempted to inquire whether he meant Senators to infer that the recommendations of that commission had not received proper attention at the hands of the executive department?

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator from Michigan is curious on that subject—and I think every Senator should be—and will examine the records of the State Department, I think he will find that the recommendations of that mission were not carried out.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. STONE. I think it is rather an unfortunate statement to say that the State Department had not done its duty with respect to the Root mission. The Senator himself says that it raises a subject which can not be discussed on the floor of the Senate, and then makes a statement of fact which might be contradicted; and who knows who is right? The Senator ought not to bring a question before the Senate which he himself says it is improper to discuss on the floor of the Senate, and make an assertion of fact like that.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I did not bring the subject to the floor of the Senate. The subject was brought to the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] in his speech of yesterday.

Mr. STONE. The Senator brought this particular matter before the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. I brought this particular matter to the attention of the Senate to indicate that the Root mission was not, in my judgment, entirely responsible for the failure which was instanced by the Senator from Kentucky; and I said, and I repeat, that, in my judgment, it is not proper for me to go into any further details.

Mr. STONE. Then it ought not to have been referred to.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WEEKS. With pleasure.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts has he some information on the point that, after recommendation was made by the Root mission on certain lines, they themselves, upon further investigation, qualified it and, out of their sense of conscientious duty, sent in other recommendations directly opposed to the one which the Senator says was not complied with?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I have not.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator, if he gets an opportunity to do so, to investigate whether or not there were not two reports—one from the head of the mission, Mr. Root, and then another by Mr. Russell—in which there was such a divergence of views that they finally decided that the whole matter should be submitted to the department for subsequent action, and that there was never submitted, and does not now exist, a concrete recommendation of any kind?

Mr. WEEKS. I shall be very glad to leave this whole question to the consideration of the proper Senate committee, and I hope its members will consider it.

SHOES.

It is not necessary to instance every failure on the part of the War Department to act promptly to indicate that there have been many such failures, but this investigation is the only way to so forcibly bring them to the attention of the Secretary of War that such conditions will not continue; in fact, the committee could not know many of the things which have been developed by the investigation. Take, for example, the question of fitting Army shoes. There is very little doubt that the shoe now being furnished the Government is a good one. They have been contracted for in a businesslike way, and there is no criticism on that score, but the sizes of shoes manufactured as a result of the specifications sent the shoemakers are substantially the sizes which have been the standard since the Civil War. Some minor changes have been made, but, practically speaking, nothing has been done to make these sizes suitable to present requirements. Yet there has been the greatest difficulty to even get this matter considered by the War Department.

Shoemakers and others interested in this subject have devoted time and energy to the question of properly fitting soldiers with shoes, and as long ago as October, 1916, an examination was made of the soldiers at El Paso, Tex. This investigation developed that out of 30,359 men examined 21,535 were found to be fitted with shoes one-half to three and a half sizes too short. This evidence was brought to the attention of the department, but nothing was done. In August, 1917, as a result of tests made at South Framingham, Mass., 81.7 per cent of the men measured were found to be wearing shoes from one-half to three and a half sizes too short. If this is true—and it has not been denied by any officer of the War Department—it means that more than a million of the men we have in uniform are wearing shoes improperly fitted and too small for them. There is no question about the desirability of properly fitting our men with shoes if we expect the highest possible efficiency.

Since August, 1917, various attempts to get this matter adjusted have failed, or partially so, and I am informed that at this time tests are being made under the direction of the War Department. But let us consider the result of this failure. Since the declaration of war we have ordered 21,000,000 pairs of shoes, basing the orders on specifications which resulted in an error in 80 per cent of the sizes purchased, or, if not, there had been neglect on the part of the officers responsible for fitting the men to that extent. During these tests the fact was developed that at one encampment there were 7,000 pairs of shoes of sizes too small for any of the men on duty there.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Did I understand the Senator to state correctly that there was an error in 80 per cent of the shoes?

Mr. WEEKS. That is the testimony before the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the nature of that error?

Mr. WEEKS. The shoes are too short.

Mr. POMERENE. That is, that only 20 per cent of the shoes that have been ordered can be worn by our soldiers?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I do not mean that, but I mean that, as the men are fitted, 80 per cent of the men are wearing shoes that are too short, as demonstrated by the result of special tests. A final test is now being made by the War Department.

The people of the country may reasonably expect that our soldiers shall be correctly fitted with shoes, and that any system which permits such a serious failure to properly fit them should be at once eliminated.

The Surgeon General agrees that this condition should be corrected and the Quartermaster General agrees that it should be done. There is no dissent on the part of anyone, yet for months, certainly for 15 months, attempts have been made to correct this situation, and nothing whatever has been done except to issue an order—not one providing an accurate standard for fitting the men—which very slightly modified one or two sizes. A change in this condition may not have been brought about by a munitions minister; indeed, it could and should have been brought about by the officers of the department, but how are such changes to be made unless investigations demonstrate the necessity and, as a result of such investigations, the Secretary of War insists that those responsible take proper action?

This is one of the details which has come to the attention of the Secretary of War. He has passed it down the line, and while both the Surgeon General and the Quartermaster General agreed to the accuracy of the situation, nobody has followed it up and made the changes which should be made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator to relate to the Senate, as an illustration of how simply the whole thing could have been cured, the incident of the Marine Corps. When the attention of the Marine Corps was brought to a somewhat similar situation, and a device was presented to them to make it practically impossible to put a shoe on a soldier's foot which did not fit him, the Marine Corps adopted it in 10 days.

Mr. WEEKS. To those who criticize the activities of the Military Committee and question the value of the investigation I give this instance, and others of importance could be added, to show how valuable and necessary it is to develop an outside pressure which will result in internal action.

Mr. President, I want to add a word relating to that subject which I should not ordinarily do. Day before yesterday a great metropolitan journal took occasion to say that the reason three Senators, including myself, were pushing these investigations was because of our failure to get contracts for our constituents. In my case it instanced this particular activity. My activity has consisted in writing two letters, one to the Quartermaster General and one to the Secretary of War. The man who brought the matter to me was Mr. Bliss, the president of the Regal Shoe Co., a man of the highest character, who is not doing any business for the Government, has not done any, has not sought any, and has told the Government that he does not wish to do it, but that he would do it if necessary. In these investigations, which were undertaken by Mr. Bliss months before the declaration of war, he has brought out many of these facts; and in trying to correct them he has developed a little device the purchase of which for the whole Army would probably cost four or five hundred dollars. I have no doubt Mr. Bliss would be glad to give them to the War Department, because he is a responsible man, financially and otherwise.

It may be necessary to attempt to assassinate reputations in order to prevent investigations of things that need investigating. As far as I am concerned, I care nothing particularly about this charge against me, but I bring it to the attention of the Senate to show the straits to which somebody is put, and that certainly the "galled jade is wincing" in finding it necessary to occupy three columns of the first page of a great metropolitan journal with such stuff as that to which I have referred.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may not be inappropriate to say that they are wasting their fire on the Senator from Massachusetts, who is as far beyond their criticisms and above the criticisms of the average caustic critic as any man in this Chamber.

COAL SUPPLY.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, no better illustration of the benefits which might accrue from a war cabinet or planning board, whatever it may be called, can be found than the coal situation in the United States. It is a particularly pertinent illustration, because the condition is one confronting us to-day. Six or eight months ago it was apparent to the close observer that this condition would develop, and I wish to apply the illustration directly to New England. About seven months ago members of the Massachusetts committee on public safety and myself devoted much time in trying to bring to the attention of the authorities in Washington the fact that New England, whose industries are running at a greater speed than ever before, would probably require five or six million tons of coal in addition to the normal supply. Nothing was being done to supply this requirement. On the other hand, the Secretary of the Navy was withdrawing tugs and other coal-transportation facilities for naval uses. He had a perfect right to do so; in fact, it was probably his duty. Our naval representative in Europe was calling on him for certain classes of tonnage, and it was his duty to supply those needs. He commandeered vessels wherever he could find them, not with an intent to injure any industries—in fact, he avoided doing so as far as it was possible—but it is not the business of the Secretary of the Navy to look after the New England industrial situation. It is his business to operate his department, and he did what any man in his place would have done in all probability. He commandeered shipping which in normal times was used in transporting from one to two million tons of coal to New England, so that instead of increasing the coal-carrying capacity it was deliberately decreased, and everyone knew it.

We could not get the Shipping Board to correct this situation. Those in charge recognized its existence, but no practical step was taken to substitute other shipping for that taken by the Navy Department. In the final analysis, the advisory commission concluded that if the shortage of coal developed as was anticipated it would be necessary to divert railroad transportation facilities sufficiently to supply the need. We all know how this possibility has failed, and to-day there are cities in New England with only two or three days' coal supply on hand. Mills largely engaged in manufacturing for the Government are being closed down, and this is in addition to the industrial concerns closed down by the ill-judged and ill-timed order of the Fuel Administrator.

Let me demonstrate two or three examples of the utter folly of this order:

Plant 1. The coal consumed by this plant for the five days from January 11 to 15, inclusive, was 457,265 pounds. The coal consumed during the five days the plant was shut down—January 18 to 22, inclusive—was 300,050 pounds, a saving of 157,215 pounds. The requirements for the shut-down days were to keep the plant heated, pipes from freezing, and prevent destruction of material in process of construction or otherwise. In other words, this plant was able to save about 15 tons of coal a day, which at $7 a ton would be $105 a day. In that particular plant the loss in wages to the employees was about $7,000 a day, and the loss in production, without figuring any profit, was in excess of that amount. This plant had sufficient coal on hand to keep its employees engaged and to give them full compensation for their services.

Plant 2. This concern employs 1,800 hands and shows the following result for the four-day shutdown: Coal saved, 325 tons, which is about 66 per cent of the normal consumption, a saving in dollars of about $2,275. More than one-half of the capacity of this plant was manufacturing supplies for the Government. The loss in production aggregated over $100,000, and the loss in wages to employees to over $15,000.

Plant 3. This is a very large manufacturing industry employing 8,000 hands. It had coal on hand sufficient to continue its operations until April 1. By shutting down there was a saving of 76 tons of coal a day, or about $532. It was necessary to burn 56 tons of coal a day to keep the plant warm and prevent the spoiling of stock in process. The actual loss to the company for the days shut down was about $12,000, without figuring any profits. The employees lost about $15,000 a day in wages, and, as I have said, much of the output of this plant is subject to hurry orders from the Government and some parts of it is manufacturing wearing apparel immediately needed by men at the camps.

I do not think it necessary to add more illustrations of the result of the situation which has developed, of the failure to prepare for it, or the absolute unbusinesslike way it has been handled in the immediate past. But what would have been done if we had had a war cabinet or planning board? It would have taken up the consideration of the coal situation last summer, learned the actual production, the actual requirements of the various sections of the country, the actual available transportation facilities, and would have provided for the situation in such a way that the present crisis would absolutely have been prevented. But there was no one to do this. The President did not have the time or the information to warrant his doing so, the heads of the various bureaus and departments were looking after their own special affairs, and there was such a lack of coordination in our governmental activities that this situation did not receive proper consideration. I undertake to say that if this matter had been handled systematically and as a result of careful planning we would not have the present coal crisis, much of the suffering resulting from this condition would have been prevented, tens of millions of dollars would have been saved, and there would not have been the delay in supplying the needs of our soldiers apparent on every hand as a result of the closing-down order.

WOOL.

Another illustration of the lack of cooperative and concentrated effort, and quite as apparent an example as the coal situation, is that relating to wool. It is important that this product be controlled by the Government to insure a suitable supply of wool for the clothing for our soldiers. It will be a difficult problem to obtain this wool supply at reasonable prices unless the Government takes such action. We produce something less than 300,000,000 pounds of wool a year in the United States and use more than three times that amount, our additional supply largely coming from South America and Australia. The wool supply of the world is not increasing but the population of the world is doing so, and even in normal times the demand for wool is such that the price is gradually increasing. One of the perfectly apparent certainties resulting from a declaration of war was that there would be an immediate increase in the price of wool, and that unless something were done to control the situation the price would become exorbitant. In order to give the Government control of the situation as far as they were able to do so, the Boston wool dealers—and Boston is the largest wool center in the United States—the day after the declaration of war offered the Government their entire holdings at the going price, or the price the day war was declared. It has been suggested that this would have allowed the wool dealers a profit. Undoubtedly it would, but the profit had been earned, and their offer indicates that they did not wish to take advantage of any necessity of their own Government. It was a highly patriotic step taken by one of the best associations in the United States.

This offer was not accepted, and the investigations do not disclose in detail just what happened to it. Various people had heard of it, but nobody seemed to be willing to take the responsibility of saying the offer was declined. Later, in the month of July, the Boston wool dealers again offered the Government one-half of the supply they had on hand, presumably the balance being contracted for by those manufacturing for the Government. In the month of September the Wool Growers' Association offered the Government its entire supply at going prices. The only definite testimony as to what became of these offers came from the Secretary of War. He stated that he had referred the question of purchasing wool from the growers' association to the raw-material division of the War Industries Board, but did not hear anything more about it. What statement could be a greater indictment of the handling of an important element in the prosecution of the war than this reference to the wool situation?

It has been said on good authority that the loss to the Government in not taking advantage of the April offer, the July offer, the growers' offer, and purchasing the imported wool available at that time would aggregate $150,000,000. It is difficult to determine whether this amount is relatively accurate, but certainly the loss in not taking advantage of the April offer of the Boston wool dealers was as much as $15,000,000, for at that time they had on hand 59,000,000 pounds of wool of all kinds.

I refer to this particular subject not so much to show what has not been done, but to enable me to express the opinion that the wool question should be given immediate consideration. In the extreme Southwest the shearing has already commenced, and in the ordinary course of conducting that business, if it is not already the case, the wool will drift into the hands of dealers, and it may be impossible to control the situation unless concerted action is taken. The Government should control the entire wool supply, using what it needs for its own purposes and turning the balance over to private consumption. Whatever may be the difference of opinion as to the merits of all-wool clothing and clothing containing a certain percentage of shoddy, there will be universal agreement that if there is to be any depreciation in the quality of cloth it should not apply to the clothing of the men doing our fighting. We civilians should wear the clothing of lesser warmth and value, and it is my judgment that this question can not be adequately controlled if action is not taken by the Government at this time. Of course, I am not referring to the failure of last year, nor will the action I urge correct it. That failure would not have been possible if we had had a planning board or war cabinet to consider such questions and determine suitable governmental action.

HOUSING.

Another illustration in favor of the war-cabinet bill. Stability of labor is the first necessity in providing for rapid construction. The concentration of the work being done for the Government is one of the alarming features of the present situation. It is reported that 86 per cent of the war activities of the Government are concentrated in a section east of Pittsburgh, bounded on the north by Massachusetts and on the south by Virginia. This necessitates a large additional force of trained mechanics in that particular region, and in order to get these mechanics they must be provided with the best living conditions possible—schools, churches, places of recreation, and housing as well. Some of the largest activities are being carried on in sections which can not possibly provide suitable accommodations for the additional labor required. The result is that men come to these places, work a short time, or until they get enough money to take them back to their homes, preferring the lower wages in the sections where they have always lived to undergoing the hardships forced upon them in the localities where their services are so greatly needed.

Shortly after the beginning of the war the housing shortage in certain sections of the country developed to such an extent that it became an obstacle to industrial production, and as far back as last June this subject was discussed. Farseeing men could not help recognizing the inevitable result of the conditions surrounding our war industries. The Committee on Emergency Construction attempted to handle it, the Council of National Defense held hearings, a housing committee was appointed and presented a report, but all of these actions were advisory. These committees had no power to act, and their efforts, therefore, were fruitless.

In the meantime the Shipping Board has actually undertaken housing in a few places, but it was not until the 14th of January of this year, when all housing matters were placed under the jurisdiction of an Advisory Council of Labor with Mr. John Lind at the head, that the first real constructive step was taken. The practical way to handle this question is through centralized control, preferably by one man, who should be given full power in the administration of any appropriation made for this purpose.

Three of the points where the housing difficulties are greatest are Quincy, Mass.; Hog Island, near Philadelphia; and Norfolk, Va. At the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., which is located at Quincy, Mass., the usual number of employees is about 3,000. There have been employed there within the past year as many as 11,000, and that number of men is required to continue the work of the Fore River Co. at its maximum capacity. However, it has been impossible, on account of the limited housing facilities, to keep the men there, and I am told that at the present time there are 3,000 less men employed than when the number was at the maximum. I have had an opportunity to witness the results of this situation—overcrowded transportation facilities on every hand, dangerous crowding in some instances, and conditions existing which can not be considered humanely decent in many respects. There are instances where numbers of men are living in one room, or in very restricted quarters, and the work at Fore River and Squantum, where a new plant is being constructed, must necessarily lose a considerable part of its efficiency, and the best results can not be obtained unless additional housing facilities are provided.

The Hog Island situation is another example of the same condition, only it is an entirely new development. The transportation facilities to Hog Island are such that it is absolutely essential to have housing constructed there in order to carry on the work expeditiously. As far as I have been able to learn, no effort has been made to develop the transportation facilities, and no steps of a practical nature have been undertaken to construct the housing necessary if we are going to secure the labor required at the largest shipbuilding plant being constructed in the United States.

The situation at Norfolk is none the less acute. There is ample testimony to show that the work there—and there is a vast amount of work being done in that neghborhood—can not be carried on with anything like the best results unless this question is settled at an early date. All the instances I have suggested relative to this subject simply bear out the fact that if somebody with power to act had been looking ahead and investigating the placing of contracts, undoubtedly contracts would have been distributed over a wider area, relieving the congestion and concentration of these activities, and lessening the acuteness of the housing situation. But whether or not this would have been done, those who were planning for providing the Government's requirements would not have had their attention distracted from this important element in the situation, and six months ago we would have had a definite plan suggested by the War Cabinet, submitted to the President, approved by him, and in active operation.

The testimony from all sides on this subject is the same. Before the Senate Commerce Committee on the 10th of January, Mr. Homer L. Ferguson, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., one of the ablest consfructors in the United States, stated: "I have been trying for nine months to get housing at Newport News and have talked to governmental officials until I am sick of the subject."

I also have a communication from Mr. Otto E. Sovereign, of the Aladdin Co., of Bay City, Mich. He states that his company has given 10 years' practical experience to this subject and yet have been unable to get any attention to their representations in Washington. The reason they have been unable to get any attention—and these are but two instances of any amount of testimony that can be submitted on the subject—is because there has not been anybody here with power to act.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to state to the Senator that I think the very next day, or at any rate within two days, after Mr. Ferguson testified before the Commerce Committee definite arrangements were made through the Shipping Board to undertake housing operations at Newport News; so that they had authority, but apparently they had not been able to get them to exercise it until the matter was brought up in the committee.

PRIORITY ORDERS.

Mr. WEEKS. Senator KELLOGG, in his speech on the railroad bill yesterday, spoke of priority orders, and what he said illustrates very well the lack of a responsible head in connection with any particular activity. He stated, if I understood him correctly, that there were five bureaus in the War Department, one in the Navy Department, one in the Shipping Board, one in the Fuel Department, and one in the Food Department giving priority orders. In other words, nine different kinds of priorities which had to be adjusted by railroad managers. Of course, in a sense, that would be physically impossible, and it created a confusion and delay which greatly impaired the efficiency of the service. If there had been one head controlling priority orders to act as a clearing house for the requirements of the different bureaus, all of this could have been avoided.

ORGANIZATION.

When we turn to the question of organization, the investigation made by the Committee on Military Affairs has, to my mind, completely demonstrated the fact that it was impossible to expand our Military Establishment to a great war force without developing weaknesses in the methods followed or providing for intermediate steps preparatory to perfecting the organization. England, to a lesser degree France, and other nations not prepared for war found it necessary to follow a similar course. The War Department could not have accomplished what it has during the last 10 months if it had not had the assistance of the advisory commission and its subordinate committees; but all of these activities at best were but makeshift and simply pointed the way to the organization which should be made. In the final analysis, the greatest requirement in the war administration is a perfect organization. Each department has to too great an extent been run as a distinct unit, and, in many respects, entirely without any reference whatever to the requirements or activities of other branches of the Government. This has produced confusion, increases in the expense of maintenance, and entirely unnecessary delays.

When the Secretary of War was before the Military Committee he was asked if there were things which could be done by the War Department to stimulate the service so that it would be able to do more effective work. He replied that he did not know of anything he could suggest, for whenever the soundness of a change was demonstrated to him he acted at once. That sounds wise and efficient, but it is the difference between waiting until you meet a problem which may require months to prepare for and having a deliberating body looking months ahead, finding that problem, and preparing a definite plan for its solution when it develops. Many activities can not be provided for in a day, week, or month. It requires a long time to erect plants, make necessary additions to plants, or design and construct machinery, and unless we provide a planning board to consider these important questions there will inevitably be delays and failures.

The changes recently made in the organization of the War Department will improve the efficiency of that service. There is no doubt about this fact, and I am glad to put myself on record to that effect. The machinery proposed, however, which was so graphically described and shown on the charts used by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] during his address in the Senate a week ago, has a fatal weakness. There is no real head in the case of the munition proposition or a general planning board provided. The branches of the tree, speaking of the purchaser of munitions, seem to be all right, but the trunk is not there. And if this situation were understood by the country as well as it is by those who have been examining the War Department there would be an insistent demand that now, when we have the opportunity, we create an organization as nearly perfect as possible.

I believe the Military Committee has had no other desire in criticizing the failures in the War Department brought about by inefficiency and procrastination than to correct them by inaugurating a practical organization of the war administration on a basis coordinating and concentrating every agency of the Government, making efficient and effective the scores of activities of the various departments, bureaus, boards, and commissions. Of course, there will be individual failures in such an organization, but this organization would be just as necessary to efficiency if every person connected with the Government were a genius. Real efficiency is impossible unless all of these undertakings are carried on as a result of a coherent plan devised and controlled by a central agency.

The President can not be this central agency except after examination and thorough investigation. He must necessarily be devoting his energies to the larger problems of our international relationship. The Secretaries of the departments can not be this agency. It should require every moment of their time, every ounce of their decision, and all their capacity to properly administer the affairs of the branches of the Government over which they preside. Take, for example, the case of the Secretary of War. I think his door has been wide open to everyone who had any business with him. He has to attend meetings of the various boards with which he is connected, and it is physically impossible for him to devote the time necessary to working out definite plans for solving the great number of problems arising in connection with our prosecution of the war. The records of the Council of National Defense and of the advisory commission show that they hold weekly or fortnightly meetings at which many of these problems are considered. Sometimes the urgency of departmental work prevents the attendance of the heads of the various departments at important meetings of these committees. We are told that Cabinet meetings are infrequently held and are usually of short duration, and after going through the entire list of boards and commissions it is apparent that there is no central body to carefully consider all the requirements of the Government or prepare any concrete plan of action.

Moreover, in addition to the Cabinet, the Council of National Defense and the Advisory Board, and so forth, and so forth, and so forth, we have at least four new creations of importance—Fuel, Food, Shipping, and Transportation Commissions. The heads of these commissions do not meet the Secretaries of the departments except upon comparatively rare occasions at meetings of what is known as the superwar council, a new creation and one without any power. The meetings of this council are, in effect, simply discussions and produce no practical results.

I have said that the failure to centralize these activities has produced extravagance. It is hardly necessary to go into details to demonstrate the correctness of this assertion. All of the testimony before the committee bears out the statement; indeed, how could it be otherwise even under the revised plan of the Secretary of War? Under this plan we will be purchasing supplies for the War Department through at least five different agencies. In addition to that, purchases are being made for the allies, for the Shipping Board, for the railroads, and for the Navy. In the plan of the Secretary there is coordination, as far as the War Department is concerned, up to a certain point, however much one might deprecate the fact that a colonel of Infantry has been put at the head of this activity, to whom four major generals are subordinate. Col. McRoberts, formerly vice president of the National City Bank, of New York, is purchasing agent for another bureau; and just recently another man has been appointed to assist in purchasing supplies for the War Department, in all probability the best-fitted man in the United States for such a task. I refer to Mr. E. R. Stettinius, of the firm of Morgan & Co., of New York.

When Morgan & Co. undertook purchases in this country for Great Britain in the beginning of 1915, what did it do? Naturally, it adopted the course any good business firm would follow. Not having in the firm or connected with it an entirely suitable man for such service, it looked about and found a man who seemed to promise to fill the requirement. This man was Mr. Stettinius. It developed that he was the right man in the right place. He did the work well, so well that he not only gave entire satisfaction to the British Government but was made a member of the firm of Morgan & Co. If he had failed, another man would have been found in the shortest possible order. That is the course followed by a business firm. What does the War Department do under these circumstances? It wants to accomplish exactly the same result as the British Government, although its purchases will not perhaps be larger than those of England during 1916, for it is interesting to note that during the years 1915, 1916, and 1917, Mr. Stettinius purchased $4,000,000,000 of supplies for the English Government. The department creates an organization such as I have described, looks about and adds to it Mr. Stettinius, not as its head, for which position he has demonstrated his capacity, but uses him under the title of surveyor general of supplies. Even the Secretary of War can not tell just what this means. The testimony indicates that he is subordinate to Col. Peirce; and yet, he is not only the adviser of the colonel but of the Secretary as well. He is a kind of court of last resort in an advisory capacity, but he has no authority whatever. In other words, apparently the very man required for the situation has been obtained, but that man can not accomplish results. He is in an impossible position, and the administration is throwng away an opportunity to make an effective organization and the one personality that would be sure to make the organization effective.

In our conduct of the war the President occupies in this country a position similar to that occupied by Mr. Lloyd-George in Great Britain. He must necessarily be the clearing house and the final authority in every action taken. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. His constitutional authority makes him Commander in Chief of all our military forces, and while it has been suggested that the proposed war-cabinet bill is unconstitutional, I believe every lawyer will agree that any constitutional authority conferred on the President can not be lessened or added to by an act of Congress. As a matter of fact, however, the President does not fill the position occupied by Mr. Lloyd-George in Great Britain. Mr. George presides over the war cabinet, and although he does not give his entire time to that service he is present at its meetings every day of the week and frequently presides at meetings several times a day, for the majority of the members of the British War Council have no portfolios and devote all their time to the consideration of plans for furthering the prosecution of the war. The authority of the war council extends to all departments of the Government, to the armies in the field, the fleet, and to every form of industry; and in this way in planning for the army or navy the industrial requirements of the nation are given proper consideration

I do not mean to suggest that the war council directs the operations of the Army or the Navy or that the proposed war cabinet would do so in this country. It should have nothing whatever to do with matters relating to military or naval operations like the direction of the Army or the operations of the fleet. Those matters are essentially under the control and jurisdiction of the heads of those departments; but the overhead matters, like making plans and considering industrial questions, would come under the jurisdiction of the war cabinet, which would, in turn, report to the President and every act of which would be subject to his approval. No other body now in existence, or which can be organized, would be able to do this. The Council of National Defense can not, the Advisory Commission can not, and the War Industries Board can not.

Senators advocating these measures have been charged with partisanship, but the country should not fail to note that this investigation has been conducted for nearly two months, has given consideration to a great number of important subjects, and there has not been the slightest partisan bias in its deliberations. Not a question indicating partisanship was raised until the President deliberately injected politics into the situation by an attack upon the chairman of the committee and the committee itself, which the chairman represents, and by calling to the White House many Democratic party leaders, not for consultation purposes but to insist that a discussion of this question on the floor of the Senate be prevented if possible. This latter statement, of course, is based upon current gossip, but as far as I can learn it has never been denied.

Here is a vital question to consider. Have we come to such a pass that the action of the most important committee in Congress at this time is to be forbidden by the President of the United States as far as he is able to do so? He need not necessarily approve, and he has the power to disapprove, this legislation if it ever reaches him, but it is vital to free speech and independence of action of a coordinate branch of the Government that such a position as has been taken by the President be resented by every Member of this body. Almost immediately after this interview at the White House opposition developed not only to the hearings of the committee but to the legislation proposed. There was a cleavage in the committee, and the very member who moved to report out the munitions bill became arrayed against any legislative action. I submit to the Members of the Senate opposed to this legislation whether they had seen any attempt at partisanship on the part of any member of the committee until it was injected into the activities of the committee by the President himself?

The majority in this Chamber may be forced into a refusal to adopt the committee's propositions. There is every evidence that the greatest effort is being made to bring this about, but I want to say that if action is prevented in such a way it is unwise even from the lowest standpoint these matters can be considered—that of strengthening one's political party. These measures may not be adopted now, but they are fundamentally right and should pass, although their aim may be partially accomplished by the twistings and turnings being made in the War Department, and which I presume will continue to be made, since the Military Committee commenced its investigation.

Let me call to your attention a partial list of changes which have been made in the organization during the last two months, most of which I believe have resulted from the investigation made by the Committee on Military Affairs:

1. A modification and practical elimination of the Advisory Commission.
2. Dissolution of Committee on Supplies.
3. The discontinuance of the operations of the Board to Control Labor Standards.
4. Change in the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance and the reorganization of the bureau.
5. Change in the Chief of the Quartermaster Bureau and a reorganization of that bureau and its methods.
6. The appointment of a superwar council, which includes the members of the Council of National Defense and the heads of the Food, Transportation, Shipping, and Fuel Commissions.
7. The appointment of a council of war in the War Department.
8. Adoption of a plan for reorganizing the purchasing system of the War Department.
9. Under this plan the appointment of Col. McRoberts as the ordnance purchasing agent.
10. The creation of the position of surveyor general of supplies, and the appointment of Mr. Stettinius to that place.
11. The forwarding of additional clothing to furnish delinquencies in equipment of the camps. Orders for this action were sent by telegraph.
12. The appointment of a board to control shipping—Messrs. Franklin, Raymond, and Guthrie.
13. The appointment of the Chief of Staff to serve at the War Department instead of in Europe, as had been done.
14. And the press now states that the President is to recommend that the War Industries Board be given more definite powers.

There may be other changes, but the ones I have enumerated are sufficient to indicate that things have been moving in the War Department, and undoubtedly they have been stimulated by the activities of the Military Committee.

The committee could have added greatly to the evidence in favor of the legislation it proposes; in fact, I have been unable to find any approved business man connected with the activities of the Government who does not believe this legislation is essential to the proper conduct of the war. Among those who have given evidence are Mr. Willard, until recently the head of the War Industries Board, and who has been connected in an important way with the activities of the Government since a considerable time before the beginning of the war. The chairman of the committee asked Mr. Willard this question: "There may be no desire on the part of the Navy to cooperate with you in this. Suppose they withdrew from it at any time?" Mr. Willard replied:

> Then it would not work, of course. Secretary Daniels and Secretary Baker have both said that they would cooperate. The weakness of the plan is that if they did not cooperate, or if a problem of some kind should develop which the departments as now organized did not seem to be able to deal with promptly and efficiently, then the President should have authority to say that this man who represented him at the head of the War Industries Board should have full authority to take that matter up and deal with it promptly. With that arrangement I do not see any reason why this will not work, but it is lacking now in that one definite thing.

Another efficient member of the War Industries Board, also associated with the activities of the Government since the Advisory Council was formed, is Mr. Bernard Baruch, of New York. Let me give you exactly what he says on the subject:

> But I would have this: I would have a man at the head, and I would have the President authorized to give that man such authority at any time as the situation seemed to require so he could take over all or any part of it, but I do not think it would be wise for him to take over all of it.
> Senator WADSWORTH. I see. Have you any observations to make of a general or particular character, with respect to the business organization herein laid out or which might be used?
> Mr. BARUCH. As I understand it, it is an effort to lessen competition and to centralize purchasing and procurement, and in that I indorse it as a step in the right direction.
> Senator WADSWORTH. Do you think it goes far enough?
> Mr. BARUCH. No, sir.
> Senator WADSWORTH. Would you care to say to the committee in what respect it does not go far enough, and enlarge upon that?
> Mr. BARUCH. It may go far enough, as far as this department is concerned.
> The CHAIRMAN. As at present constituted?
> Mr. BARUCH. Yes.
> The CHAIRMAN. In what other respect do you think the general plan should go further?
> Mr. BARUCH. I think that the purchases should be centralized in one agency, directly under the President, and not as a Cabinet officer.
> Senator WADSWORTH. Not as a Cabinet officer?
> Mr. BARUCH. I do not think that is necessary, because I look upon this as a war measure and one that should cease with the war.

One of the most important witnesses in favor of this legislation was Mr. Gifford, a director of the Committee on National Defense. No man has been more intimately associated with every class of business man or the work of the Government during the last 18 months than he. In his testimony relating to this subject he was asked this question by the chairman of the committee:

> Do you think there should be a central head?
> Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir; I do. I am now referring, however, wholly to the war industries situation and not to those other activities of the Council of National Defense.
> The CHAIRMAN Did you see the program mapped out by the Secretary of War for coordination?
> Mr. GIFFORD Yes, sir; I have seen it.
> The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything lacking about that to make it a perfect system?
> Mr. GIFFORD. Nothing but the power to carry it into effect. The Council of National Defense has no power.

And he goes on to explain that in the plan suggested by the Secretary the one thing that is lacking is a central organization with power in addition to the plan proposed.

Mr. Vauclain, the President of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, has also been one of those who have been here during the last 18 months and has done sterling work for the Government. In connection with his appearance before the committee regarding another phase of the investigation he was asked these questions by Senator WADSWORTH:

Senator WADSWORTH. To come back again to my proposition, so as to be clear about it, that question of confidence in the judgment of men who go out and negotiate for this material for artillery or powder or munitions—I do not want to misquote you at all, and correct me if I am wrong—your judgment is that things would work better and we would make our decisions quicker and get started quicker if those men who do the negotiating did not have to submit their proposals to the consideration of boards of three or four or five men?

Mr. VAUCLAIN. Certainly.

Senator WADSWORTH. You believe in single head executives?

Mr. VAUCLAIN. I do.

Senator WADSWORTH. You think there should be a man in charge, for instance, of what you are in charge of, and a man in charge of another thing and another thing, etc., without the interposition of consulting boards?

Mr. VAUCLAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. And clothed to act by authority of law?

Mr. VAUCLAIN. I think he should be a regular officer of the Government.

Senator MCKELLAR. A statutory officer.

Mr. VAUCLAIN. Yes, sir.

One of the members of the House mission to Europe, who gave very much consideration to the details of handling the war questions in Europe, wrote me, without solicitation, on the announcement of the introduction of these bills, as follows:

JANUARY 19, 1918.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My recent trip to England and France, when I was a member of Col. House's mission; my observations here, where I am a member of the priorities committee; and a good deal of continuous thought about the matter make me entirely sure that this situation should be reorganized and that there should be in substance a war cabinet of, say, five men, who should have no executive function and whose whole job should be to determine the program, war and otherwise; that is to say, should determine the war program and how far it can go because of other needs.

It should work closely with the supreme war council on the other side, so that it would be the body which should determine what this country is to do. It should also inform the supreme war council of what this country could do, so that the demands formulated by the supreme war council would be possible of fulfillment.

There should also be a supply department, which should be executive, and preferably should deal with the entire question of military supply. It should not build ships, either mercantile or Navy, but should furnish the materials to the shipbuilding plants. It probably should not take over the operation of Navy ordnance plants or Army arsenals. They are only a drop in the bucket anyway.

I realize that there has been an enormous amount of discussion about this matter and that you have been in the thick of it. The thing that has struck me in most of the reports of the discussions that I have heard has been that the emphasis has been on the munitions department rather than on the war cabinet. I think that they are both important, but the war cabinet is the more important. An inefficient department of supply or departments of supply can do better if the demand is formulated and they are told what they have got to supply than the best supply department in the world can do if it does not know what it is called upon to supply.

The supply department, when it is created, should have simply a supply function. It should not have anything to do with the formulating of demand.

The service men can be of great value in the formulating of demand. It is a military question, and one which ultimately they must decide, although, possibly, they had better act as advisors of the members of the war cabinet. The supply end, which is a job of mobilizing industry, can better be done by civilians and as a civilian organization.

I hope you will excuse me for butting in, but I am afraid the influence is getting put on the least important of the two things which are being so much agitated to-day.

Yours, very truly.

_____.

Mr. Howard Coffin, originally a member of the Naval Board appointed by Secretary Daniels to consider important naval questions some time before the beginning of the war and later a member of the Advisory Commission, in addition to serving on the War Aircraft Board, testified in the strongest terms in favor of the director-of-munitions bill and the war-cabinet bill. I have not his testimony before me.

For many months the United States Chamber of Commerce has had a committee considering war questions, the membership of which includes: William Butterworth, president of Deer & Co., of Moline, Ill.; John H. Fahey, former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce of Boston; Harry A. Wheeler, former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce of Chicago; Homer L. Ferguson, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co.; Charles Nagel, former Secretary of Commerce and Labor; Lewis E. Pierson, former president of the American Bankers' Association and chairman of the board of directors of the Irving National Bank, New York. This committee was organized on June 12, 1917, and has been substantially giving its time to war questions since that date.

The following extracts I shall give from its report will indicate the position the committee has taken on this subject. Mr. Catchings, its chairman, greatly impressed us with his clear statement as to the desirability of legislation of the kind proposed by the Military Committee. This war committee reported to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States as follows:

When, on July 13, your committee stated in a war bulletin that there was need for a central agency to control the procuring of war materials and supplies, to formulate programs, to reach decisions, to stop debate, and to take decisive action, your committee was but making public statement of views held by many officials of the Government and others in intimate contact with the situation.

Toward the end of July the need of centralized authority and responsibility in connection with the procuring of war supplies and materials was recognized in the appointment of the War Industries Board. Unfortunately, the statutory power and responsibility to make war purchases remained scattered in the various Government departments. This has made it necessary for the War Industries Board, in its efforts to secure coordination, to rely only upon the common desire and purpose of all Government officials.

In a bulletin issued on August 10 your committee pointed out that the War Industries Board had no authority to decide inevitable differences of opinion between independent activities or to formulate policies subordinating one war-time activity to another. Furthermore, the bulletin stated that, not being an official department of the Government engaged in procuring war materials and supplies, the War Industries Board was not in a position to plan and execute broad programs to meet the great industrial problems of the war.

"Resolved by the representatives of American business, met in war convention, That all war buying should be assembled under the control of one board or executive department; and be it further

"Resolved, That this war-supply board or department should be given full power to procure war supplies to the best advantage to the Government as to price, quality, and delivery, and in a way to maintain essential industrial life without disturbing social and economic conditions, including the power to fix prices not only to the Government but to the public on essential products and to distribute output in a manner to promote the national defense and the maintenance of our industrial structure; and be it further

"Resolved, That Congress be hereby requested to pass such statute as may be necessary to give the President of the United States all power necessary to concentrate in this manner the resources and the industrial energy of our country toward winning the war; and be it further

"Resolved, That the national chamber do its utmost to make effective the purposes of these resolutions."

1. It is clear that without our efforts and resources the war can not be won.

2. With the experience of both friend and foe to guide us, we continue to rely upon the executive organization inherited from the times of our peaceful isolation, reenforced only by the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the War Trade Board, and the committees and boards formed under the Council of National Defense, the principal one of which is the War Industries Board. There has been created no department of munitions or war supplies, war-supply board, or similar agency of whatever name, able to bring about centralized control or cooperation between the various Government activities engaged in procuring war materials and supplies.

3. We are forced to the conviction that disaster is inevitable unless prompt provision is made to centralize the control of the industrial energy and material resources of the country.

No attempt has been made to get associations or individuals to take any action in regard to the war cabinet or munitions bill; but this has been done by some organizations, and notably by the Merchants' Association of New York, which on February 2 passed resolutions favoring the passage of both bills. This is one of the largest and most representative business organizations in the United States. These resolutions not only point out what this association believes are the existing conditions but do not mince words in describing in detail the belief that both of these measures should be passed. Among other things, they say:

There is imperative need for a controlling head, directly under the President, to decide upon policies, subject to the President's approval; to prepare a general program; to define the part to be taken in such program by every subordinate department; to supervise, control, and coordinate all their operations; and, in general, to perform the functions of a general manager in a great business corporation.

And, speaking of the President's connection with this legislation, they say:

It is not proposed to deprive him in the slightest degree of any of his constitutional powers, but simply to place at his command an agency which can devote itself exclusively to a mastery of such details and to the supervisory work necessary for effective operation.

The association then points out seven deficiencies of the many it has noticed. They are as follows:

1. That there is conflict of jurisdiction between the War, Navy, Marine, Shipping, Fuel, and other departments.
2. That the President has so many matters of fundamental importance pressing upon him that he is physically incapable of supervising in detail the functions of these departments.
3. The fuel supply of the Nation has fallen short because no effective coordination with transportation facilities has been effected.
4. Building of ships has been held up for the same reason—lack of proper transportation and fuel transportation.
5. The labor supply for shipbuilding has been shortened by failure to provide necessary housing accommodations for workmen.
6. Factories which might have been employed upon essentials have been employed upon the production of munitions and supplies which can not possibly be used for a year to come.
7. The activities of these factories is urgently needed in the production of other material at once.

One of the notable features of the present situation is the virulence used in attacking those who favor this plan. They are referred to as plotters, mischievous meddlers, and even as servitors of the enemy. Every means of false suggestion has been used to discredit a sincere and loyal attempt to make a change which will materially increase the efficiency of our war administration.

Let us see a little more definitely what the war-cabinet bill really means. Its purpose is to authorize an agency, which we have never had and have not now, to prepare programs to carry on the war. In a little more detail, it will advise and formulate plans and policies, and under the direction of the President will procure their execution. It will coordinate and direct, under the control of the President, all the functions of government. It will consider and determine, subject to the President's approval, every difference that may arise between departments or agencies of the Government. This organization would be a clearing house which would consider every phase of a situation and report to the Commander in Chief, who would then exercise his powers as such over the activity involved.

It has been claimed that it would reduce the present Cabinet officers to the positions of clerks. There is no justification for this claim, because they would administer their departments exactly as in the past; but whenever there was a conflict of authority, or whatever differences might develop, the question would be considered and brought to the attention of the President for his action. The war cabinet would be the President's staff—a staff not unlike a military staff—looking after the matters relating to his command and reporting to him the results of its investigations.

It has been charged that Congress is meddling in the war and trying to curtail the authority of the President. The President will name these men; Congress will not do so, and there is no possibility that it will furnish a means for Congress to interfere with any activity over which it has no jurisdiction. Can it be possible that the President will be embarrassed by such a cabinet, as he has suggested he would be? It would seem as if he would be embarrassed to a greater extent by a perpetuation of the disjointed system which now exists, a system which has failed to produce ships, notwithstanding the shipping plans; which has failed to deliver sufficient fuel, notwithstanding the unbounded coal supply we have; which has been responsible for a failure to protect our soldiers against sickness and furnish them with suitable clothing. We are the inventors and leaders in aeroplanes, and yet we have no aeroplanes. We have the greatest steel works in the world, and yet we have few guns. We lead the whole world in automobile manufacture, and yet we are just commencing to obtain motor trucks; and the worst of all, the system we have had is responsible for camp hospitals not having heat, water, or sewerage.

Congress has resolved that every resource of the country shall be devoted to the successful prosecution of the war, and as far as possible this pledge has been fulfilled. Can anyone claim that it is not the duty of Congress to see that the resources it has provided are so expended that a consummation of the purposes for which they are given is insured? How are we to know that this is being done in a manner satisfactory to the Congress and the people of the country unless investigations are held and the details of the work of the administration scrutinized? Moreover, we owe everything to our men on the other side and to those on this side training to take their place at the front. They are to be plunged into the vortex of the most deadly military operations men have ever had to encounter. Every conceivable device to kill, maim, and torture is in operation on that great battle front. What excuse can we make to our soldiers if we are neglectful of their security, their comfort, and, in the final analysis, their lives? The loyal man in the United States is not he who complacently assumes that everything is as it should be, who is willing to accept general statements for detailed information, but on the contrary is the one who is ever alert to do and to see that there is done not our bit but our very best. We owe this to our fighting forces, our country, and to ourselves, and should not be diverted from that course by unreasoning or uninformed criticism from anyone, whatever his position may be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I find it necessary, as a member of the Military Affairs Committee who was present during the investigations before that body, to reply to some of the unjust criticisms and assertions, assertions and criticisms not warranted by the disclosures made by the testimony before that committee. Especially is this true with reference to certain statements made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

I had intended this morning to limit my discussion to the provisions of the war-cabinet bill and the bill introduced by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to improve the existing War Department machine, but I believe the condition requires that other statements shall be noticed, and briefly I am going to refer to them.

In the first place, the criticisms do not take into account the difficulties that had to be encountered, and the main purpose of most of the criticism, it seems to me, is to attack and embarrass the administration rather than to complain of the inefficiency of the War Department. I do not attempt to justify inefficiency anywhere on the part of any man. When we declared war we undertook the mightiest enterprise in the annals of time, to wage successful war 3,000 miles across the sea, with an Army that had not been raised to be transported in ships that had not been built, against an enemy that must be fought in the air, on the earth, under the earth, and under the sea, a powerful enemy that had whipped the other great nations of the Old World to a standstill.

No other nation in the history of the world, no nation upon the face of the earth now, no nation but ours was equal to such a task.

The things already done in its accomplishment have been so great as to stagger the belief of our own people and to challenge the wondering admiration of the allied nations.

The difficulties were indeed great. We had no battle field of choice, were without an army except an insignificant handful of trained men, and were not permitted to choose the field of operations for our Army, as had been done in wars heretofore. No; we must fight yonder in France on the battle line already fixed, almost stationary, where the allied forces and the enemy are intrenched, and we must first cross 3,000 miles of ocean in which lurk the deadly submarines that brought about the war.

We could not fight except on the sea, where no enemy battleships could be encountered, until we could get the consent of the other nations to land our Army upon their shores. It is easily perceived that the allied nations, in a death grapple with the enemy, successfully resisting his advance into their country, would not allow us at once to take an active part in their vast operations or turn over part of the battle line to us, inexperienced in this new method of warfare. So changed have become the conditions of fighting in this war that our own officers even, regardless of their rank and experience in the service, were absolutely without knowledge or experience of how the campaigns must be conducted and the warfare must be waged.

These were the difficulties that confronted us at the time we went into this war. Now, what has been done? When war was declared the small machine that had controlled our little Army, insignificant in numbers, and provided for its maintenance, began to expand and reach out to accomplish a task the like of which had never before been dreamed of. The great captains of industry and finance, the ablest merchants in the marts of trade, the most powerful leaders of American labor, the most resourceful men in the professions were all called in conference and responded instantly, voluntarily placing all their ability and wisdom acquired from experience at the Nation's service. Surveys of the Nation's resources, industrial and financial; of its raw materials, manufacturing capacity, transportation facilities; surveys of the world's supply of products necessary to be used in arming, equipping, maintaining, and feeding our armies and those of the allied nations were made.

These volunteer and advisory agencies, in conjunction with the War Department, found new sources of supply of raw materials, developed new sources of manufacture, and mobilized the Nation's resources and powers.

What has been the result? In less than nine months an army of a million and a half men has been assembled, fed, clothed, housed, uniformed, and equipped, and several times more men than we had in our Regular Army when war was declared are already yonder in France, fully equipped, trained, on the battle front and capable, in the estimation of France, of successfully resisting and defeating the invading enemy and holding the battle line. That has been done up to now.

There has been criticism of some of these volunteer agencies. It is unwarranted and unjust in a large respect. It has been said that their procedure was necessarily unfair; that the Government had to expect a man who was interested in a particular line of manufacture or industry to serve here for the Government, frequently dealing with his own concern, and not give his own private industry the advantage. In other words, it was said if this man's personal interest conflicted with the public trust reposed in him he would necessarily not serve well two masters, and that the Government interest was more likely to suffer than that his own private interests should be permitted to do so. The familiar legal principle is invoked that a man should not be put in a position where his actions in the performance of the trust would conflict with or affect his individual and private interests. The law scrutinizes closely all such transactions, but allows them to stand when they appear to be fair.

It was unfortunate that able men who only understood the conditions and how to supply the munitions for the Government could not be found outside of the industries and manufactories which had to be dealt with in their procurement—unfortunate for the men, since it subjected them to criticism, regardless of the fairness of their transactions and their great benefit to the Government.

That has been the criticism against these volunteer organizations and boards; but no single particle of testimony has been brought out in the investigation which discloses any crooked transaction by any of these boards anywhere, and I challenge the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from New York or the Senator from Massachusetts to point out the evidence, if such there is in existence. It is not there. It never has been there.

There was a supply committee, and it is said they have contracted with certain corporations and not with others. The supply committee had this sort of a condition confronting it: There were only 12 or 15 manufacturing institutions in the United States that had been taking Government contracts. The demand was so great and the supply was insignificant of material, both the raw material and manufactured products, that they found it necessary to suspend the public letting of contracts. Why? The public letting of contracts was intended, of course, to protect the Government by encouraging competition in bidding and preventing awarding of contracts at too high a price.

There could be no competition, however, under the condition existing—the law of supply and demand was eliminated when the demand was so great and there was no supply; it was deficient, inadequate, short—did not exist. It was in future to be manufactured. The law of supply and demand had been put aside, was gone, was not operating any more. Then what could be done? You could not have competitive bids for the immediate supply of materials and products not in existence, and for which the manufacturing capacity of the country was inadequate. No; these things had to be developed.

This committee, composed of men expert in the manufacture of things that had to be supplied, made a survey of the manufacturing capacity of the country, found it inadequate, encouraged the extension of some plants, the conversion of others, and the operation of all to maximum capacity for supplying the Government's needs. They standardized the fabrics, determined the amount required, and allocated it to all the different manufacturing concerns in quantities proportioned to their capacity. They engaged all that could be interested. They fixed the price that should be paid for the materials to be manufactured where possible and a reasonable price for the manufactured product, and employed the services altogether of about 300 manufacturing plants where heretofore the Government had only used about 12.

What has been the result? The Army has been clothed, uniformed, and supplied with shoes, blankets, and tents, which could not otherwise have been done.

The further charge was that the committee had violated the law in refusing to advertise for bids. The law requiring the advertising for bids was properly suspended by an order duly made, and it was done in order that the supply might be increased, that the goods might be had, and that the Government should not be robbed by those who had the control of the deficient supply that was on hand. That was the reason which actuated the supply committee. Had they continued to issue the advertisements for bids, showing there was so great a demand for certain kinds of material, those who had the short supply there was on hand would have increased the price outrageously, to the Government's injury. That would have been done unquestionably. That has been the experience in all lands. The committee thought that was the best business ability that could be exercised, and they used it for the benefit of the Government.

The matter is strikingly illustrated in a cartoon by T. E. Powers I picked up the other day. It appeared in the Arkansas Gazette, and I noticed it also in the Washington Times of the same date. It shows strongly the point and the grasping greed the supply committee attempted to outwit in doing what it did. There are two sets of three pictures each in the cartoon. The first illustrates the Food Administrator talking to the consumer, saying "Now, fish is good food. You ought to eat fish and help win the war, that the Army may have meat." The fish dealer, standing under a sign, "Fish 6½ cents a pound," hears the conversation. The next morning the man says to his wife, "You need not bother about a roast to-day; I will get some fish. Fish is good food, and we can conserve the meat supply and help our Army and the armies of our allies." When he reaches the fish dealer's he finds fish marked $9 a pound, and is shown a fish as big as his finger at four and a half dollars.

The next pictures show the Food Administrator telling the man to help win the war by eating corn bread, so that we shall have more flour and a better grade of food for our allies, as well as our own troops. The corn-meal seller, with a sign over his door, "8 cents per pound," hears the conversation. The next day the man says to his wife, "I will go down and get some of this corn meal. It is fine, and we can help the Government and conserve the food supply." When he reached the place where they sold corn meal there stood a great big dealer in the front door, under the sign changed to "Corn meal, 80 cents a pound." No wonder the would-be purchaser collapsed, fell dead.

That is a very clear illustration of the condition that had to be met, and that was met successfully, by the supply committee and these other committees by cutting out the advertisements for bids and the awarding of contracts.

Yes; but it is asked, Did not this man Eisenman, the chairman of the supply committee, permit a contract to be made with one Kaplan, who had a brother in the National Council of Defense, for a base sorting plant—a rag plant, if you please—where they were to collect all the rags that were cut from the cloth from which the uniforms were being manufactured in different cities, widely situated, in one particular place and sort and get them ready for sale? I understand that was done. What about this rag plant? The Government had never operated one before. Always heretofore all the clippings that had been cut from all the cloth that had been manufactured into overcoats and into uniforms and into soldiers' clothes had been given free of charge to and kept by the manufacturers of the uniforms. They never had been preserved. It never had been expected they could be of any benefit to the Government. But at this time, here was so much cloth that was being cut out into these clippings and into these rags that was not put into uniforms that this committee said, "We ought to have a base sorting plant; we ought to collect and save these rags." Why? Because this is valuable material. They can be cut up and worked into some of these fabrics that must be made, as "reworked wool," and it is worth 50 cents a pound as reworked wool to put into these different fabrics. Now, these different clothing manufacturers who made the uniforms and overcoats lived in 5 or 6 or 10 or 15 different cities, as New York, Chicago, Cleveland—they were far separated. Then they located this base sorting plant at New York, where the rags were collected. They called before this branch of the committee, before the plant was authorized, the people who were dealers in rags to ascertain what it would cost to collect and assort the rags.

From what they were able to learn they concluded about 6 cents a pound would be a price that would allow a reasonable, fair compensation for the service. The rags were worth, when assorted, anywhere from 30 to 40 to 60 cents a pound, to be used as "reworked wool."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Was there any evidence before the committee that it was worth 6 cents a pound to assort those rags?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; they said——

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that any man who said it was worth 6 cents a pound to assort rags knew nothing about what he was talking about. All they had to do was to write to any woolen mill in the United States and they would have found that not only the sorting of rags of one color is not worth more than 1 cent, but that to sort the white from the colored is worth not to exceed 1 cent and a quarter a pound.

I have had millions of pounds of such rags assorted, and I never paid more than a cent a pound for assorting rags. These rags were of one grade of cloth. It seems to me that anybody who would testify that it was worth 6 cents a pound to assort such rags ought to have his head fixed.

Mr. KIRBY. I regret exceedingly that they did not call the Senator from Utah in reference to this rag-sorting cost, because he seems to know about it.

Mr. SMOOT. If the committee had done so, I should have been able to have informed them.

Mr. KIRBY. I have said that I regret exceedingly that it was not done.

They stated that the testimony before them showed that the profit would not be great at that price, and the Government would have a saving, in any event, of the difference of between 6 cents agreed to be paid for collecting and sorting and 40 to 60 cents a pound, which the rags were worth for reworked wool. They had to be collected from the different places where the clothing was being manufactured. There was also a provision put in the contract that the profits, even, should be limited to not more than 1 cent per pound, and finally to not more than one-half a cent. The matter of price was subject to audit and adjustment by a provision in the contract, just like in all of the contracts of the Government. What was the result? There was an audit made; there was an adjustment made; and the profit was reduced to half a cent a pound. Finally the contract was canceled and nothing whatever—no profit at all—was paid.

That is the condition as it has actually developed. The Government has the Base Sorting Plant; the Government has saved all of the money that these collected rags were worth—from 40 to 60 cents a pound for reworked wool that heretofore had been given absolutely free of charge to the manufacturers of uniforms.

Mr. POMERENE. That was done; and as soon as it was discovered that excessive profits could be made the Government changed the system?

Mr. KIRBY. My attention has been called—and I thought I made that statement—to the fact that as soon as it was discovered or intimated that the profit would be excessive there was an audit and an adjustment of the amounts to one-hall cent a pound, and finally the contract was canceled and nothing was paid. It is not shown by a particle of testimony that this man Eisenman or any man on his committee had a single particle of interest, financial or otherwise, in the operation of the Base Sorting Plant. It cost nothing to assort the rags therefore no profit was paid therefor, and the testimony has come to us just in this way. That is what has been done. It was shown also that the men on the Council of National Defense who were interested in the operation of this plant, or rather who had relatives interested in the plant, did not have anything to do with the letting of the contract for its operation nor with the establishment of the plant. Nobody has questioned that statement. The Government has not only not been injured, but greatly benefited by the establishment of the rag plant.

I want to say to Senators that the performance of this committee has been very great; it has been most efficient and has been without expense to the Government so far as the talent employed was concerned, and I want to put into the RECORD here to-day as a perpetual memorial to the vastly beneficial and unselfish service these patriotic men rendered the Government in our time of need the memorandum report of that committee made to the Secretary of War. I ask leave to include it, without reading, in my remarks as a part thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

DECEMBER 29, 1917.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF WAR SUBMITTING STATEMENT OF THE FUNCTIONS AND ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLIES OF THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The committee has been subdivided into the four following sections: Woolen goods, cotton goods, knit goods, and shoes and leather.

WOOLEN GOODS SECTION.

This section has devoted itself to the business of assisting the Quartermaster Department in purchasing woolen fabrics for Army use, having in mind three main objects:

1. Quantity: It became evident very early that enormous quantities of woolen cloth would be required. While at the outbreak of the war less than a dozen mills had been accustomed to bidding on Government contracts, we have secured the cooperation of over 300 mills, comprising nearly all the larger establishments and most of the smaller ones that were adapted to manufacture Government fabrics.

We have investigated the productive capacity and equipment of all the woolen mills in the country. It is safe to say that not more than 10 per cent of the mills adapted to such work are not now engaged in the manufacture of fabrics suitable for military use.

Additional purchases in very large amounts, many of them on very short notice, have been made for a number of foreign governments, and in no case have these been allowed to interfere with our own requirements.

We have purchased over 19,000,000 blankets, over 20 000,000 yards of overcoating, and over 30,000,000 yards each of shirting flannel and suiting, involving an expenditure of over $345,000,000.

2. Quality: With the assistance of the cooperative committees of the two associations of woolen manufacturers specifications have been made with the view of maintaining the quality of the Government fabrics and increasing the sources of available supply. While many emergency purchases were made of fabrics not strictly according to specifications, due to urgent and immediate calls from various departments, we have now thoroughly standardized the fabrics which are being manufactured by the different mills.

3. Price: From April to the present time prices of raw materials have advanced from 30 to 40 per cent, supplies from 25 to 100 per cent, and labor at least 20 per cent. In spite of this advance in the cost of manufacturing this committee has been able to obtain all the fabrics required at prices less than 10 per cent over those prevailing in April, while for the past four months it has paid a fixed and uniform price for each of the standard fabrics.

General: It has been necessary to go into a wide field of operation in placing these huge contracts. We have secured for American manufacturers the release of large quantities of foreign wools, the exportation of which the British authorities were reluctant to permit. We have also obtained the consent of the British Government to the release of nearly 78,000,000 pounds of Australian wool for military uses, at a saving of over $25,000,000. We have arranged for the securing of much necessary machinery and many supplies needed in the manufacture of this tremendous yardage. We have written hundreds of letters of inquiry and advice to many different manufacturers, have consulted with them personally on manufacturing problems, and have endeavored with the loyal and valuable cooperation of the woolen industry to place its resources at the services of the country.

A careful survey of the situation leads us to believe that we have greatly increased the production, standardized the quality, and saved many millions of dollars in the purchase of woolen fabrics.

THE BASE SORTING PLANT.

There is attached hereto a copy of a certified report, marked "Exhibit A," from Messrs. Loomis, Suffern & Fernald, of New York City, on the Base Sorting Plant.

The men selected for the task of arranging the business of collecting together the rags resultant from the cutting of Government woolen goods were selected because of their fitness and for the same reason that other men have been selected to perform the necessary functions in carrying to a successful conclusion our part in the war. Up to some four of five months ago the Government contractors who were making clothing for the Government from materials furnished to them by the Government, retained as a gratuity all of the rags resulting from the cutting of goods. These, in turn, were sold by the manufacturers of clothing to the many rag dealers in the trade at prices that before the war ranged from 25 cents to 28 cents a pound—up to 40 cents a pound and above since the war. In order to stabilize the price on all woolen materials it became necessary in the refinement of the job to stabilize the price of all the fundamentals that went into the manufacture of the goods. Thus it became necessary to stabilize the price of wool substitutes and shoddies, these for the most part being made from rags and clippings remaining from the goods that were cut for Government uniforms. Since the Government now owned all of the remnants and rags resulting from the manufacture of uniforms, it became necessary to establish a medium whereby these rags could be concentrated or brought together in one spot. Uniforms for the Government are made in Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Chicago, San Francisco, St. Louis, and many other points. The gentlemen comprising the base sorting plant were asked to perform this function for the Government because of their technical knowledge of the business, so that the redistribution of these rags to the cloth manufacturers could be made in the best and most intelligent manner. A maximum price was thus established upon these cuttings and sold by the Government to the cloth and blanket manufacturers at a uniform price, approximately 10 cents a pound below the market. The resulting saving to the cloth and blanket manufacturers was deducted from the price of the goods sold to the Government, thus giving the Government, first, the advantage of millions of dollars in the savings of the clippings, and, second, in the resulting savings from the price per yard on cloth and blankets the Government purchased from those manufacturers. The saving thus far in these operations has been almost a million dollars, and the plan contemplates and will save to the Government many millions of dollars more in the future.

It has also eliminated any incentive for clothing manufacturers to use extravagantly the Government cloths, and this saving will be a very large item.

It has stabilized the price of reworked wools, checking a rise of 60 per cent from April last and reducing this figure to 45 per cent, holding it at this point since July last and to this day. This also has been a very large saving to the Government.

It has also prevented the profiteering in these reworked wools by those engaged in that industry.

The base sorting plant is run by three of the most competent men in the industry and without any compensation whatsoever and without any profit. All accrued profits from the very organization of this plant belong to the Government without any charge for services of these men and without profit to anybody but the Government.

The Base Sorting Plant is now and has been since its inception under the absolute supervision and control of the depot quartermaster at New York City and the War Department.

THE USE OF RECLAIMED AND REWORKED WOOL.

Reclaimed and reworked wool has been used in conjunction with virgin wool in the manufacture of 30-ounce melton and 3-pound blankets, and has resulted, on orders placed since May 1, in a saving of over $31,000,000 by the Government. It has conserved wool to the extent of at least 70,000,000 pounds. It has saved the Government a calculable amount of over $24,000,000 and an incalculable amount due to the lessening of the demand for raw wool to the extent of 25 per cent of this country's wool clip. In addition, the benefits derived in consequence of the comparatively earlier delivery of cloth and blankets because of the use of reclaimed and reworked wool can not be expressed in terms of dollars and cents.

The opinion of the Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce, to wit: "The importance of new wool fiber as distingushed from reworked wool and mixtures in fabrics has been greatly exaggerated" is very interesting to note.

As a matter of fact, mixtures prepared in accordance with current United States Army specification for blankets and 30-ounce O. D. melton are superior in heat retentive qualities to similar cloth produced from the best grades of wool now available—i. e., quarter-blood wools. The reason for this superiority is found in the greater felting quality of reworked wool, resulting in a more complete filling of the interstices which exist in all cloth.

COTTON GOODS.

Since May this section has studied the markets and needs of all the Government departments for cotton cloth, bandage cloths, blue and brown denims, duck of all kinds and weights, pajama cloths, hospital gauze, domets, flannellettes, and various other fabrics. It has listed all available duck machinery and has made recommendations covering over 250,000,000 yards of goods; has opened up new sources of supply for duck from tire fabric makers, carpet makers, and cotton mills not ordinarily on fabrics for which there was such urgent need.

It has stimulated production, advised as to technical procedure, acted as the advisor of the priorities committee on all textile matters, has equitably allocated huge quantities of paulin duck over the duck trade, secured for the Government prices running uniformly below—and often far below—the market, coordinated in so far as possible cotton goods purchases made by the different Government departments, and now in addition to the above is, at the instance of the War Industries Board, deciding as to the distribution of certain grades of duck, on which there is a shortage, to the civilian trade.

It is also handling all waterproofing contracts for the Quartermaster Corps.

KNIT-GOODS SECTION.

The quantities of gloves, underwear, and other knit goods needed by the Army was largely in excess of the machine capacity of the country. As a result it has been necessary to open up new sources of supply and to greatly increase the output of present mills in order to meet the requirements. In addition the specifications have in many instances been changed, so that to-day the goods ordered are of a much better and warmer quality.

To give a clear idea of the vast quantities bought, and particularly of the short space of time in which the purchases were accomplished, a table of purchases to date of the principal articles, together with the amounts purchased to October 6, 1917, follows:

	Purchased to Oct. 6, 1917.	Purchased to Dec. 28, 1917.
Drawers, winter	13,369,813	25,150,332
Undershirts, winter	10,872,692	21,084,053
Gloves, woolen	4,600,697	11,349,664
Stockings, wool, light weight	11,621,534	31,754,373
Stockings, wool, heavy	7,922,088	21,130,088
Toques	.....	2,825,000

In addition to the above, large quantities of cotton drawers, undershirts, and stockings have been purchased.

SHOES AND LEATHER.

It has been our effort to assist the Government in the expert knowledge necessary to make purchases in the most efficient manner. This necessitated the cooperation of shoe manufacturers, tanners, and all those producing the essential supplies in order to secure quantity and quality at a fair price, necessitated the standardizing and redrafting of specifications, and further needed the incorporation of a new type of shoe more adequate for present-day war requirements.

In recommending the purchases of approximately 21,000,000 pairs of leather shoes, we call attention to the following:

a. Our plan of a combination of competitive bidding for part and a fixed price for part has made a saving to the Government of $1,632,000 over the plan of strictly competitive bidding for the entire amount.

b. In order to eliminate speculation on the purchase of materials, options were obtained on leather and supplies and guaranteed to the manufacturers at a fixed low price. This policy has permitted a net saving of approximately $4,000,000.

c. Original specifications called for calf, veal, or kip. We recommended a change to side leather, which was adopted, thereby increasing wearing service and resulting in a saving to the government of $806,000.

d. Believing an army shoe made with a drill lining was unsuitable for war requirements, we recommended a new model unlined shoe, which was adopted, and which has been more serviceable in every respect at a reduction in cost, thereby permitting a saving of $496,000.

e. Total savings from the above suggestions approximated $6,934,690.

Realizing the importance of prompt delivery, the following figures are of interest:

RUBBER BOOTS AND ARCTICS.

In the recommending of purchases of rubber footwear we have taken advantage of the total daily productive capacity of the country, and have recommended purchases of the best quality produced at exceptionally low prices for delivery in accordance with our needs in quantities as follows:

	Pairs.
Four-buckle arctics	2,476,000
Hip rubber boots	1,500,000
Short rubber boots	735,000

MATERIAL FOR THE REPAIRING OF BOOTS AND SHOES.

Having in mind the repair of leather and rubber footwear in this country and in France we have recommended large purchases of the necessary materials for the deliveries needed at very low competitive prices and have done so after most careful consideration and investigation. In this connection we have put under specification, have recommended, and will complete recommendations within a few days, for approximately 10,000,000 pairs of leather tap soles, 7,000,000 pairs of heel lifts, and 6,000,000 pairs of top lifts, and all other necessary materials in similar proportions.

CANVAS LEGGINGS.

After making a most careful investigation of existing conditions we have recommended and are about to recommend purchases of approximately 11,000,000 pairs of canvas leggings, having optioned the materials and allotted same to successful bidders in quantities in accordance with the size of their contracts.

LEATHER GAUNTLETS.

In a similar manner we have recommended and are about to recommend the purchases of approximately 2,500,000 pairs of gauntlets.

PURCHASES FOR ALLIED NATIONS.

Pursuing the same general policy we have outlined purchases for Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Russia on the following articles, totaling approximately $40,000,000: Leather shoes, four-buckle arctics, hip rubber boots, short rubber boots, and materials for the repair of leather shoes.

In outlining these allied purchases we did not allow materials or deliveries of the finished product to in any way interfere with the needs of our own Government.

Recommendations according to the above approximate $190,000,000. These have been made only after most careful investigation and exhaustive study.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Cots: Purchases were authorized and made of 2,107,056 cots, of which 1,132,056 were canvas Army cots; 975,000 all-steel cots. The committee was instrumental in effecting the substitution of the superior and more economical all-steel cot.

Aviators' clothing: We were requested by the Signal Corps early in September to assist them in the clothing requirements for aviators, and make recommendations as to where their requirements could best be taken care of, both as to price and deliveries.

All official requests for such information have been taken care of to date, and all contracts completed with the exception of recommendations made December 20. The amount of contracts, placed and completed, amount, in round figures, to half a million dollars.

STATISTICS AND PRODUCTION.

This department was instituted in May, 1917, soon after the committee was authorized by the Secretary of War to assist the Quartermaster Corps in the purchase of certain items of clothing and equipage. The first work of this department was the collection from all available sources of the data necessary to the work of the committee on all contracts existing on May 1 on the items in which the committee was interested, together with the recording and summarizing of the same data on all contracts placed after May 1 on the recommendation of the committee.

Early in June the system of recording data was in full operation and the work of installing a production or "follow-up" system was commenced. At the same time the department started a system of charts, presenting graphically the relation between estimated requirements, contracts places, etc.

The necessary forms and blanks for the follow-up work were started in July, and all contractors were at once notified to report to the committee on forms supplied them for the purpose, first, of deliveries made to date on each contract and thereafter weekly on the weekly shipments made on each contract.

The information thus obtained was tabulated and has been used as a basis for all follow-up work intending to increase deliveries and by the various purchasing divisions of the committee in determining the size of new contracts, etc. Weekly reports were also obtained from the various quartermaster depots which were used as a check on the reports of the different contractors.

By August 1 the foundations of our present system were established, and since that time the system has been expanded as additional articles have been added to the list on which the committee was asked to advise.

Our work may now be divided into three main divisions, with the following principal subdivisions:

1. Contracts:
   (a) Authorizations from Quartermaster General.
   (b) Contracts placed.

2. Production:
   (a) Weekly report of each contract.
   (b) Status of each contractor.
   (c) Delinquencies and speeding up of production.
3. Statistics:
   (a) Weekly report of work of committee.
   (b) Charts.

How the work of this department has been increased can be shown by the following comparisons:

Original number of articles handled by the committee	19
Present number of articles handled by the committee	142
Number of contracts placed before May 1, 1917	625
Number of contracts placed between May 1 and Dec. 22, 1917 (approximately)	4,650

The money value of these purchases totals approximately $800,000,000, and the cost of the adjudication of this immense volume of business has been less than $20,000.

Every effort is used, with the assistance of the various members of the committee, to prevent delinquencies and to hasten production. Any shortage of deliveries must be adequately and immediately explained, and overproduction is urged through letters, telegrams, and personal interviews. The total number of letters sent and received to date has been approximately 80,000 and of telegrams approximately 10,000.

From all the various reports received we are able to tell at any time what has been accomplished by this committee, and our present status is shown by the attached weekly report.

GENERAL.

It has been necessary for this committee to give some preference orders to manufacturers under section 120 of the act of June 3, 1916, in order to insure priority to Government contracts.

A number of lawsuits and contemplated legal actions arising between civilian contractors and manufacturers and calculated to throttle the effectual delivery of merchandise to the Government have been amicably adjusted.

More than 100 manufacturers, leaders in their respective lines, in conferences with several hundred others, have assisted in the careful study of quartermaster specifications, resulting in skilled revision and modernization. The elimination of middlemen has been largely accomplished

Satisfactory results have been achieved in assisting the Finance Bureau of the Quartermaster Department in expediting payment to contractors. We have in many instances taken advantage of cash discounts never before contemplated in Government purchases.

We have cooperated with the various agencies functioning on the settlement of labor difficulties.

We have zealously attempted to assist those doing business with the Government by consistently directing all inquiries, which have been voluminous.

The efforts of this committee have been helpful in securing fuel, machinery, raw materials, railroad and express facilities for those Government contractors entitled to assistance.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, this committee, as has been heretofore said, dealt in about $800,000,000 worth of goods in about four months, in about 4,500 separate transactions, averaging about 200 orders a working day, of $4,000,000 in amount; wrote about 80,000 communications and sent 10,000 telegrams. It did this in the short period of time in which it was operating. The great men who were on this Council of National Defense and who had nothing to do with the activities of this particular supplies committee—Mr. Willard, the president of this great railroad company, and Mr. Gifford, who was acting as the director of the Council of National Defense; Mr. Catchings, the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and some of the other men who are in that class, who were in constant touch with the conditions—said that, with the help and assistance of these volunteer agencies, we were able to go forward twice as fast, to accomplish twice as much, as would otherwise have been done, and at only one-half the expense to the Government that must have resulted otherwise. That is what these other men who are in touch with this condition thought about it.

Well, it is said that some of the blankets are not as good as they ought to be. The blankets have been manufactured and bought according to specifications made by the department and furnished to this particular agency for guidance. The blankets which were not the best were doubtless bought because of the emergency created by the unusual winter and because the best other blankets had not been properly distributed. All of this cloth was manufactured and delivered, however, in time for it to have been manufactured into uniforms, allowing seven weeks for the manufacture of uniforms, in time to have reached the soldiers before the winter came on.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] said that some American clothing company was not treated fairly in the allocation of these contracts for the manufacture of cloth into uniforms. This particular company which he complains about not being fairly treated did not have any plant that it could convince the Government of its ability to manufacture; it did not own the plant; it did not own the building; it was more of a broker going out to secure these contracts and to sublet or farm them out. They were sort of sweatshop manufacturers who were going to work in that way.

The Government said, "No; we do not allow these contracts to go to any manufacturer who does not comply with the sanitation and health laws of the State where his manufactory is situated." That was the reason that some of these fellows did not get contracts. That, however, did not delay the manufacture. The uniforms were manufactured in time to have gotten to all the cantonments when needed if they had been properly distributed and winter had not arrived in unusual severity and a month early. But the voluntary organization had nothing to do with the manufacture of the uniforms. That is the condition along that line.

Would it have been done better if we had had the war cabinet which Senators are talking about here to-day? What difference would it have made under the circumstances? There is no possible inference or reason to be drawn from these occurrences that would call for the support of a war-cabinet bill, which takes the conduct of the war out of the hands of the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and puts it into a cabinet that is proposed by the Congress, and whose authority is absolutely defined and fixed in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether there was the slightest evidence before the committee that any member of this great organization of which he is speaking used his high position for private gain or for the advancement of the interest of any particular person or corporation with whom he was remotely, directly, or indirectly connected?

Mr. KIRBY. There was not one particle of evidence to justify that sort of inference.

Mr. KING. Or could any such conclusion be drawn from any of the evidence before the committee?

Mr. KIRBY. Not further than an inference that might arise from the fact that this man Kaplan, who was in charge of operating the Base Sorting Plant, or who inaugurated it, was of kin to a member of the Council of National Defense, who was not even on the supplies committee, and the fact that there was more paid, or rather agreed to be paid, than, as afterwards developed, the service was worth.

Before I forget it, I desire to say that the only complaint made by responsible men or manufacturers before our committee about the manufacture of cloth and fixing the price was made by some gentlemen who had great capacity for manufacturing, who manufactured fine woolens and fine cloths for the making of officers' uniforms in the allied and other armies overseas. They did not say that the price fixed by the committee for the manufacture of cloth was too high, but they said the price fixed by it was so low that they could not make a profit at all on it in their mills, which they used for the manufacture of this other cloth; that they could not afford to manufacture it at the price. That was the chief criticism by anybody who was in a position to know about it. But the committee was able at the prices fixed to get all the needed cloth manufactured.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas another question?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Was there any evidence before the committee which tended to show that any of the articles constituting this $800,000,000 expenditure, to which the Senator referred, cost the Government more than they would have cost if a different method of handling the business had been adopted or if these civilian employees or the men who volunteered their services had not been giving their services, and the work had been discharged solely by the department or the officers of the Government? Would the articles purchased have been obtained cheaper than the cost that the Government was compelled to pay?

Mr. KIRBY. There was no testimony that would indicate that such was the fact; there was not a particle of testimony to that effect. There was this sort of a proposition: It was stated that the Navy was able to procure its supplies, and was able to procure its fabrics and uniforms by advertising for bids, and it was asked why the Army had not been able to do the same thing by competitive bidding. Then it straightway developed that no good could have resulted to the Government from competitive bidding when there was no supply of the things to be purchased on hand; when the supply had to be manufactured, and new sources of supply found and developed. The Navy, in the last analysis, has done well, admirably, but that fact has been unfairly used throughout this investigation in disparagement of the War Department and its agencies. Daniel Willard, when he testified, was asked, "Do you not think that the War Department would have done better if it had an organization like the Navy," replied, "The Navy is a small machine in comparison with the War Department." It was then insisted that the work might have been done just as well or better; that the Navy was about one-third or one-fourth as large as the War Establishment, but Mr. Willard said, "It does not appear that way. I am told the War Department is eight or nine times as large now. * * * As it comes through the clearance committee, the Navy Department there, we will say, is 10 or 15 per cent, and the Army is all the rest of it."

When Mr. Baruch was asked the same question, what did he say? He said:

"Yes; the Navy has done well, but the Navy is a small, compact organization, which was already in the market; and it was allowed to go out and dip into the stores of manufactured supplies without consulting the convenience or the necessities of the other departments."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I desire to ask the Senator from Arkansas if it is not his belief that Members of Congress would bring about greater efficiency, get along faster, bring about better results, serve the Congress and the Government better and the soldiers better, if they would take these specific complaints directly to the War Department and demand an immediate investigation and report on them, rather than bring them onto the floor of the two Houses of Congress at this critical time?

Mr. KIRBY. I think there is no doubt but that it could be better done in that way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But then they would not have a chance to make a speech.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; that would not furnish a man an opportunity to make a speech.

I regard it, Mr. President, as most unfortunate that the Committee on Military Affairs, of which four members have spoken here and one in New York, did not reduce to writing its findings from the testimony given and the disclosures made. I insisted that that be done. It was not done. If it had been done, the statement could never have been made by the Senator from Nebraska that "by the 20th of January the committee, with practical unanimity, decided that drastic action was required, and thought, instead of bringing the testimony before the Senate and denouncing the particular officials who were inefficient or incompetent, that it ought to bring in a bill that would provide a remedy and relieve the conditions." There was no such unanimity of opinion in that committee, and I deny the statement. It could not have been made if my suggestion had been followed out. I have insisted that that sort of a report ought to be made instead of bringing all these things out on the floor of the Senate and laying them before the people, each man insisting that the committee's investigation disclosed a certain condition, when everybody else on the committee is disagreeing to the statement so made.

I want to mention the matter of rifles, about which complaint has been made. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said that there was a lack of foresight, a lack of vision, in not making rifles back yonder in 1916; that one of the Government arsenals was absolutely idle; that smoke no longer ascended from its chimneys; that operations there had been abandoned; and that the other factory was not run to full capacity in 1916. The War Department was blamed for this inactivity, for this lack of foresight, for this lack of vision and lack of preparation for a war that was to come in April of the next year. Lack of preparation in 1916! When we were fighting out and winning a political campaign upon the issue that we had been kept out of war and that there was no necessity for the country going into war! They are blaming the War Department for not having anticipated that sort of a condition when there was no appropriation made for carrying out any sort of a program, if it had been instituted. The appropriation for small arms for that year, I understand, was only $250,000; at any rate, it was about one-tenth of what it had been several years prior thereto. Is there any lack of wisdom or lack of foresight under the circumstances? Yet the department is criticized severely because of that.

They talk about the shoes that were manufactured. They do not contend that the right kind of shoes have not been manufactured; they do not say that the shoes have not been manufactured as the War Department specifications provided they should be manufactured, but they say 80 per cent of the shoes manufactured are too small for the soldiers who are to wear them. I do not believe that. If all the experts in the world should come here telling me that 80 per cent of the soldiers of this Army of 1,500,000 are wearing shoes two or three sizes too short for them I would say it is not true; it is contrary to human experience; it is contrary to the physical facts and not to be believed. A soldier can not wear shoes two sizes too short for him; he can not march in them; he can not get around in them; and he can not fight in them. That is said to be a great shortcoming in the War Department that might have been remedied by a war cabinet. How? How would it have been remedied by a war cabinet?

A coal shortage has developed and that is charged to the administration of the Secretary of War, although he had nothing to do with it, I understand, so far as the activities of the department were concerned. It is but a criticism of the administration for not having foreseen the conditions. It is a criticism of the administration for not having been able to forecast the weather for the last year, and to ascertain long in advance that there would be such a spell of winter weather as has not occurred in this country for years, that would block transportation, and would keep the coal supply on hand from being distributed to the consumers who were in need of it. All that is charged up to the War Department; and it is said it might have been remedied had we had a war cabinet.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. One of the most frequent criticisms urged against the policy which has been pursued by the War Department is found in this, that, instead of letting all contracts to the lowest bidder, the contracts have been given for cost plus a given per cent, ranging from 10 per cent down, in no case more than $250,000 profit to be allowed on any one contract. I desire to ask the Senator whether the investigation shows that, as the result of that character of contracts, the Government has suffered any disadvantage, or whether, if competitive bidding had been resorted to, the results which have been desired could have been so successfully, so efficiently, or so cheaply consummated?

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, in answering that I will say that we had before us the facts in connection with the whole development of cantonment building. The testimony does not disclose that the Government has been fleeced or robbed because of extortionate prices charged for the work done. The testimony does disclose that there was no possibility on earth of having these cantonments built by competitive bidding. There are no concerns in the United States that could have undertaken and completed so great a task or project in the time that it had to be done with the capital it had on hand. It was a physical impossibility. Therefore, the Government said, "We will pay you so much cost plus so much per cent if the expenditure reaches a certain amount, cost plus so much per cent if the expenditure reaches a certain other amount, and cost plus so much per cent if the expenditure reaches a certain other amount, but in no event, regardless of cost, shall you ever have more than $250,000 because of any single improvement." The testimony disclosed that the overhead expenses of these great construction concerns are from 2 to 3 per cent—that is the estimate of overhead expense—to enable them to get ready, go on the ground, and manufacture the particular articles or undertake the particular construction work. The percentage of profit that has been paid to the construction companies for the erection of these cantonments, taking them all into consideration, does not amount to more than 2½ or 3 per cent on the entire contract price. They could have been constructed under different conditions at far less expense to the Government, but they all had to be constructed at the same time and within about four months, and it could not have been done by any other method than the one pursued. That was what the evidence before the committee disclosed.

It has also been said that, if we had had a more efficient medical department, we would have had the hospitals sooner completed. There was no order issued to hold up or delay the construction of hospitals. The contracts were all let together, and it was intended that all the buildings should be constructed along together. The contractors built certain sections and certain portions of these cantonments to the exclusion of certain others. It may be that they had to build the hospitals with more care; I do not know as to that; but some of them were not completed at the time the men were expected to be mobilizing. These cantonments had to be finished in two or three months, and they were finished in that time. That has been accomplished. Could a war cabinet have done better? My own personal judgment now is, since I have seen the whole picture, that probably we did not need any cantonments. Having seen all there was to see of the conditions as they have been brought out concerning these things in our country and the billeting of our soldiers in France, it is probable that if we had said, say, to a small town above Little Rock in my State, "You have one company; get up two; you have enough room there to house two companies and take care of them;" and then we had said to another town, "You take four"; to another, "You take five"; and then, as these men were trained, gradually bring them together in one place or send them on to France and have them finish their training there. It might have been that we could have saved money in that way. Our soldiers are not in cantonments and camps in France to-day; they are billeted out among the people. They sleep in a loft here; they sleep in a barn or storeroom there; they sleep wherever they can properly and safely be taken care of; but our hospitals in France are the best in the world. We had to construct the hospitals which have been erected over there, and that is the kind we have there at the front. There has been some delay in the construction of hospitals at the cantonments in this country. They may not have been constructed as early as they could have been if something else had been neglected, but the death rate per thousand, even in the cantonments, is less than it is in civil life.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may make a suggestion, I have heard some criticism on the floor of the Senate with reference to the hospital conditions in the South. The cantonments were placed in the South largely because, as I understand, it was thought that the climate was milder, and for that reason it was a more desirable place to locate the cantonments; but the South this year has been in the grip of winter just as the North has been, and some of the Senators who have criticized the Government for not having proper hospitals at the cantonments in the South last summer were complaining very bitterly because the cantonments were located in the South and because the soldiers were not left in the New England States and elsewhere for the purpose of training. I refer to this to indicate how very easy it is to find fault with the things which other people are doing.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the hospital condition in the cantonments is not bad; it has not been shown to be bad. There is a difference between the camps and the cantonments. It was not expected that a hospital would be placed at the National Guard camp in Texas of which Gen. Greble is in command. It was thought that the soldiers of the National Guard stationed there were reasonably well seasoned; that they would go down there and remain in their camp and that a tent hospital, a field hospital, would be all that would be necessary for the men in that camp under the conditions that usually exist in that section; but the weather, as the Senator from Ohio has said, has been unusualy rigorous; the thermometer there has fallen below zero, a thing that I remember to have occurred but once before in my whole life up to now, and I live farther north than the camp in Texas.

As to the location of the cantonments and camps the Surgeon General swore that they were all well located except one; that there was no objection from a sanitary or hygienic standpoint to the location of any cantonment but one, and that that objection had been shortly removed. They were located under medical supervision and after consultation, not with the Surgeon General's office, but with the particular branch of the Army medical service of the department that located them.

They complain of the powder-manufacturing facilities not being adequate and say that we will not be able to manufacture all the powder that we probably will need; that we are not making all the poison gas that is expected to be used in our explosive shells "over there," and they say that it is because we do not have a war cabinet. They do not say that we have not enough powder; no man has dared to stand on this floor and say that the disclosures before the committee reveal the fact that we have not all the powder we can use or that we will use for this whole year. It is true we have had to buy some of our shells in France, and they talk about "poor, bleeding France." Do you know that the testimony as it comes to us about that proposition shows this, and nothing more? France said to us, "We have mobilized and centralized our industries for the manufacture of munitions until we will have to demobilize them unless the employees are furnished more to do, unless we can supply you with explosives. We have more than we can possibly use; our manufactories are already organized and operating to a great maximum capacity and output, and unless you let us manufacture your shells and ammunition of a particular kind we are going to be in distress, because we must slow down, and our workmen will be out of employment; there will be nothing for them to do." That is the reason for purchasing from France, to improve conditions for France as well as to supply our needs in the shortest time in the most practical and businesslike way. The same reason holds also for procuring our big guns and certain types of machine guns that Gen. Pershing decided were best adapted for our own use in battle. We bought those guns from our allies, who had them to spare, because they were the kind we needed and we could get them when we needed them, delivered where they were to be used. They could not be manufactured by us here in time, anyway, and the fact that they have not been is no criticism of the efficiency of the War Department. If we could have manufactured them all on time, it had been better in any event because of the shortage of shipping to buy where no ships were needed for delivery.

As to supplying chlorine and gas, about which complaint is made, we have already made arrangements until October 1 for our supply of explosives and poison gas; they are coming along, and are being supplied, and we have made arrangements to construct—and their construction is actually under way now—plants to take care of the condition from then on. What more could have been done by a war cabinet? The Nebraska Senator criticized unsparingly all activity in any way responsible for the condition for producing supplies and munitions that are absolutely indispensable and having them delivered at the ports for shipment when there were not sufficient ships provided to carry such supplies without delay. He insisted that all the energies of the Government should have been directed rather to the construction of shipping and not the preparation of the supplies and munitions which had had to wait for the ships. That certainly is a peculiar view, supported by neither reason, sense, nor sound judgment. It had been a beautiful spectacle indeed to have constructed the ships to the exclusion of the manufacture of the supplies, absolutely necessary for the support of our own and the allied armies, which had to be carried whether we had constructed ships or not. It was the intention, of course, and every energy of the Government that could be brought into activity for the purpose was started for the completion of both projects. Had it been done otherwise it might have resulted only in having newly constructed ships lying idly at the wharf waiting the manufacture of supply cargoes. Such view also leaves altogether out of consideration the prospect that we should be able to procure ships enough from our allies and by purchase from neutral nations to carry such munitions that had to be supplied.

Mr. President, I can not recall all of the little criticisms which have been made. I did not expect to reply to any of them; I did not know the testimony before the committee was going to be used and distorted in the particular way in which it has been made use of. I have tried, however, to reply to everything that I thought ought to be mentioned that has not been correctly reflected before the Senate according to the testimony and disclosures brought out in the investigation of the committee.

Now, let us see about the war cabinet. What is the expert opinion of the necessity for it? The Secretary of War says, "I think that with this organization as it is now completed"—and there are over 15,000 men in this organization; there is that much talent being employed—"I think with this organization as it is now completed, from the experience of the past improvements can be made that will enable it to perform the service better than any other organization that can be effected at this time." The War Industries Board, which is criticized, has at the top the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretaries of other departments, and men connected with various industries, and in each particular line there is one man who is at the head and who has supreme authority all down through that particular branch, with the President over all. Those men are all on the War Industries Board. The Secretary of War thought that by adjustment and conference and agreement it could handle all the problems that will come before this board to be dealt with. Why? Because the members have all the authority; there is this man in his field, and that man in his field, and another man in his field; we have it all there—the entire field—and all the improvement that could be suggested by Willard; that could be suggested by Baruch; that could be suggested by Gifford; that could be suggested by Catchings, the chairman of the United States Chamber of Commerce; that could be suggested by Coffin, of the Air Board—all the improvement that could be suggested was that the machine might be improved and made more nearly perfect if there was statutory authority vested in one man to perform certain particular functions of combination of agencies or activities.

Some one asked him—Willard—if he thought this man ought to be a member of the Cabinet. He said, "No." Some one asked if he thought he ought to be put over the Cabinet. He did not know whether he ought to be put over the Cabinet or not.

I will read you just what these men said.

Mr. Willard, in reply to the question about whether or not this man ought to be a Cabinet official, said:

I have never thought of it in that connection. I do not think he needs to be, certainly, and his only function would be to procure something that the other agencies had failed to procure in the most satisfactory way.

Senator WARREN. But his authority would be supreme in that particular thing in the procurement of that particular thing?

Mr. WILLARD. Yes; and I think he should be. As it is to-day, if anything is to be procured for the Government, it must be done by certain departments and can not be done anywhere else, not even by the President. There ought to be an agency that could deal quickly with that, and that agency should be a man reporting to the President—

That is what he thought about it—

Senator KIRBY. With supreme authority?

Mr. WILLARD. Yes; when called upon to act; but I would not turn it all over to him at once, you understand. I would not turn it over to him at all unless it developed that it was necessary. (R., 1825.)

That is what he thought about the operation of this war-making machine. He was here in the course of its construction and saw all these things being done, and he was on the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, and all departments in the War Department reported to him any and all information that he asked for, that he might be kept in touch with everything. He discussed it with the other members of the advisory council, and that is what he said to our committee.

Mr. POMERENE. He was the chairman of the advisory commission?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes. Let us see what else he said:

I do not think there can be any objection to this particular plan.

That was the plan of the War Department, as outlined on the charts on the wall here when Senator WADSWORTH spoke. They asked him specifically about it as now organized and he said:

The objection that is made to the war ministry, as it is understood, is this: We have got a large plan working, with 15,000 men pretty well organized. We have put a lot of good strong civilians in there. Now, to go and change it all at once would make more or less confusion and it is not necessary if you arrange to take care of any defects that may develop in this plan—

The plan is there, the machine is there, it is in operation, and he does not think it ought to be changed except to have some authority that might remedy a defect if one developed—

It is not necessary now to do the thing that is in mind when you speak of a war minister because we have done away with the necessity in some way, but with this plan that we have we have got to put something in between to prevent competition in articles that are short and to develop supplies of raw material and finished products. A war industries board can do that, and if it has the standing that it would have if the head of the board reported to the President and had his authority from the President this plan I believe will work just as well, and I would prefer it to the arrangement of a minister of munitions. (R., 1826.)

That is what he said about it—

I think the organizations that have been formed are the organizations that he would use, because I think they have been made efficient. What duties he should take over I do not think you should prescribe in the first instance.

This statement is in line with the Overman bill.

What duties he should take over I do not think you should prescribe in the first instance.

He thought that you should not limit it by authority of statute here. The power should be elastic; it should be plenary; it should be in the hands of the Commander in Chief of the United States of American in the war, that he might use it only if necessary, and that it ought to be sufficient for any condition that may develop.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator know that that is exactly what the munitions bill does—leaves it entirely with the President, with plenary powers?

Mr. KIRBY. I am talking about the war-cabinet bill and the Overman bill now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Was not the Senator quoting Mr. Willard?

Mr. KIRBY. I was.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Willard was talking about the munitions bill in his testimony.

Mr. KIRBY. I read just what Mr. Willard said, and it is from pages 1822, 1825, and 1826.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When Mr. Willard testified, no war-cabinet bill had been introduced. It was not under discussion. He was speaking of the director-of-munitions bill.

Mr. KIRBY. I am reading his testimony, and the Senate may put its own construction upon it.

I do not think you should say a man should be appointed with authority to do a lot of things. I think if you authorize the President—this has grown out of my experience on the board—if you authorize the President to say that a man at the head of war industries shall have authority to do such things as the President may delegate to him from time to time, that will cover everything that is necessary, and he will only take over those activities that are necessary to be taken over. It is not necessary to take over all the purchasing.

This is with reference to the munitions suggestions here:

Perhaps only a small part of it will have to be taken over, but there will come important questions from time to time—perhaps the question of powder supply, possibly the question of nitrate supply, perhaps of forgings—some particularly important things may come up which may not be going along as it should under the existing organization, and in that instance let the President have authority to say that that matter shall be transferred to this individual. (R., 1822.)

He said he did not favor the creation of a civilian authority to take over those activities.

Mr. Baruch said:

It seems to be in the minds of many to destroy many of the splendid things that have been done, but in my opinion it would not be necessary, and I must concur with Mr. Willard and say that whereas there may be things, and there are things, to criticize, there has been a lot done.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think the committee feels that all of this system should be abolished.

Senator W. * * *

Mr. BARUCH. As I said, a great many of these agencies are in the right direction, but they have not gone far enough, and they ought to go further, so as to have this definitely fixed in this individual acting under authority, because all of the authority should be given to the President; that is, a man who is responsible. (R., 1840.)

That was his view of it.

As a matter of fact, this agency would be established so when the war is over it drops away, and it leaves the Navy, which we are all proud of—they have no task compared with what the Army has, and it was an older organization and received more money, and there were a good many reasons why it should be where it is. It would, it seems to me, be wrong to let the Navy go out and take its supplies here and there. For instance, a question which you very seldom hear discussed, is the question of chemicals which enter not only into explosives and food, but into the very clothes and everything you have got on you. There is trouble there in competition. They require large quantities for ammunition, and the Navy needs ammunition, and they have got to go out and get their supplies. It should not be right that they could go out and dip in here and dip in there without respect to the other departments of the Government or the allies. These things stretch out into innumerable things, which must be centralized somewhere. [R. 1843–44.]

Now I want to read you what Mr. Gifford said and Mr. Catchings. This is from Mr. Gifford's testimony:

My view would be that if the President had the power to appoint a director on the War Industries Board, I would prefer one man. I would prefer a one-man board, where direct executive work could be done. Then, if it were made possible by Executive order, we will say, for the President to transfer from the War Department, the Navy Department, or the Shipping Board, any purchasing committee which it might develop should properly be centralized from these departments into this section, as the scheme works along, we would transfer such things as had to be centralized, such as steel, for instance. No one questions, for instance, that steel will have to be centralized. It will have to be centralized somewhere. We can not have it handled by the Army, the Shipping Board, the Navy, and our allies. If they could be transferred out of the various departments and put under direct war industries, you would have a workable organization that would not be so comprehensive and so detailed as to break down in its functioning, and yet you would obtain the object of taking care of these vital needs, which I call the war industries. [R. 1864–5.]

Senator KIRBY. This top man would have to have sufficient information about the productive capacity and the supplying capacity to know all about the needs, as well as the power to do the thing after he knew.

Mr. GIFFORD. He is obviously the one man in the Government to know the whole productive capacity of the country. You can have 15 bureaus of the Government all learning about the total capacity of the country, but the thing must be dealt with as a unit. They must all look to Washington or some individual man or board.

Mr. Gifford was asked, "Do you not think the ministry of munitions in England is a desirable thing to copy here?" He said, "No; do not follow that as your ideal," and then he read into the record these criticisms of the munitions board in England:

This article says, on the subject of purchases for the Government, that the subject has received the attention of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of England, and a memorandum has been prepared which has been submitted to the various ministers:

"The council desires to record its opinion that such diversity of control, which permits competitive purchasing, does not make for economical and efficient national production. They are informed that orders for supplies are placed by the ministry of munitions, the Admiralty, the war office, and the air board, acting as the chief services, and that each of these has separate departments, which operate, frequently without consultation, in competition with each other."

He said, "I think we can do better than that," and they are bottoming this upon the war board or munitions board in England.

Now, I am going to read from Mr. Catchings's testimony and then quit.

Mr. Catchings, too, was in favor of an elastic central power that might be exercised when power was needed; that might be put in operation by the President and might stop on any particular line when the necessity no longer existed for its use.

He said:

I want to say in connection with a sudden change that it has never seemed to us at any time that a sudden change should be made, but that these various organizations should be taken over under another control. We certainly should regard it as most unfortunate if the splendid buying organizations that have been created, particularly such an organization as the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, should be disturbed; but in our judgment there is no reason why that bureau should not be responsible to a man who was responsible for the activities of other bureaus and buying departments, so that he could bring about a common connection and singleness of purpose between them.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you would not wipe out any of the organizations, but would leave to the central power—whatever you might call him—the authority to absorb, to utilize, and to eliminate as he saw fit.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It seems to us, sir, that it is quite unthinkable in this enormous enterprise, of such a vital nature and difficulty, to consider destroying what we have. You must use what you have and build up from it. You can not stop fighting the war while we create an organization. [R. 1901.]

Every man there whose experience was such as to bring him in contact with the organization of the war machine, and who had seen its development and its operation, who was capable of forming an opinion, said that was the only improvement he could suggest in the organization as it now existed. The Overman bill provides that the President shall appoint this man for the exercise of this elastic power; that he shall report directly to the President, and that he shall remedy any particular condition that seems to be wrong, using all other departments and agencies in all other departments where it is necessary to do so. That bill will remedy any possible defect that can be conceived to exist along that line.

Now as to the war-cabinet bill: If the President is capable of conducting this war as Commander in Chief of the Army of these United States, he ought to have granted to him all the power of the Nation that he thinks necessary to be used. We have said he is capable. The people have said so. The people of these United States implicitly believe so. This war-cabinet bill, as proposed, would take away from him the function of being Commander in Chief of the Army, and of carrying on the campaigns as he thinks they ought to be conducted. I say that the war cabinet proposed, with its fixed authority and its fixed jurisdiction and with the right to do the things that are proposed to be given it to do by the bill that has been introduced, would conflict with the operations of the departments of the Government by the President of the United States as Commander in Chief, and that it could not but result in confusion and injury to the conduct of any possible plan of conduct of the war. No wonder that the President has objected to this; and the necessity for it is not shown to exist. What could have been done that has not been done?

Mr. President, I have only discussed the matter along the line of criticism. I did not intend to do anything but discuss the two measures when I started out; but I believe, on the whole, that remarkable things have been accomplished by the agencies that have already been developed; that it was not possible to do these things without making a few mistakes, without a plan miscarrying here and there. Having seen the entire investigation, with my experience in the past in weighing testimony, with my experience in the past in deciding controversies and cases, I believe that there is no particular thing or things done or left undone that can be pointed out that should condemn this war machine as inefficient. I believe that all has been done, and reasonably well done, that was humanly possible under existing conditions since war was declared by these United States. If anything has not been done that ought to have been done, a war cabinet could not have remedied it, in my opinion; and I believe in future if there is necessity for improving this machine that the agencies provided by the Overman bill will do it without confusion, that they will do it without disorganization or interruption of a machine that has done all these things so well, and can do all things necessary to be done better in future for having done them in the past.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, several Senators who intend to discuss the railroad bill have intimated that they desired to make such preparation. In view of the importance of the bill, the absence of a number of Senators, and the difficulty at this time of securing the attendance of a sufficient number to give the matter the attention that it deserves, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, February 16, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 15, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Father which art in Heaven, we thank Thee for the historic religious ideals that find freedom in our Nation and that are zealously serving our needs to-day; for Judaism, with its ancient glory of the law and the prophets; for Catholicism, with its organization and conservation; for Protestant Christianity, with its differences, its unities, and its openness. Unite us all under the flag for world justice, humanity, and kinship.

By the lips of Thy Son Thou hast said, "Many are called, but few are chosen." Let the myriads in our Nation hear and answer the call to political, industrial, financial, and domestic loyalty; and let the few chosen to plan and to lead, as the Members of this House be wise in counsel and true to their grave responsibilities. In the name of Jesus the Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GREGG, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for three days, on account of illness.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Accounts.

Sincerely, yours, CHRISTOPHER D. SULLIVAN.

The resignation was accepted.

H. H. HOGAN.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider in the House the bill (S. 3689) authorizing the Postmaster General to cancel or readjust the screen-wagon contract of H. H. Hogan, of Kansas City, Mo.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to consider the bill S. 3689.

Mr. COX. Let it be reported, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That should the Postmaster General find as a fact that the screen-wagon contract of H. H. Hogan, of Kansas City, Mo., was entered into prior to the entrance of the United States into the war with Germany, and that the prices agreed to be paid in said contract are at the present time inequitable and unjust by reason of the increase in the cost of materials and labor employed in the performance of such contract, the Postmaster General is authorized, in his discretion, with the consent of the said H. H. Hogan and his bondsmen, to cancel the same or to readjust the terms of said contract in such manner as to relieve the contractor from the hardships being by him suffered on account of such increased costs and expenses.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-seven Members present, not a quorum.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 3433. An act requiring the Government to furnish uniforms to officers of the Army or Navy, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I nominate for election the gentleman from New Mexico, WILLIAM B. WALTON, as a member of the Committee on Irrigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina nominates the gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. WILLIAM B. WALTON, to be a member of the Committee on Irrigation.

The question was taken, and Mr. WALTON was elected.

H. H. HOGAN.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for the consideration of the bill S. 3689, authorizing the Postmaster General to cancel or readjust the screen-wagon contract of H. H. Hogan, at Kansas City, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. I object.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9867) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, presenting, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the first bill from that committee since it fell to my lot to succeed the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald, I believe that I may be pardoned for saying just a very few words outside of the bill proper. There has been in this country from time to time, and especially recently, considerable agitation for what is generally spoken of as a budget system for the consideration of the financial affairs of the Nation. Unfortunately we have always been more or less under the tyranny of phrases, and, as a result of that loose thinking that sometimes seems to be a national characteristic, many people speak about a budget system without any realization of what is involved, and much criticism that is unintelligent is leveled at Congress, and much praise is given administrative suggestion because of the supposed failure of Congress to institute a budget system.

I shall not to-day take time to go elaborately into this subject. I hope at a future day to speak concerning it at length, but I do want to say a few words touching the recommendation that has been made by the President of the United States in favor of one appropriating committee of the House, and also touching the broad aspect of a budget. Personally I have always favored a concentration of appropriating power, but I do not consider that that represents in any degree an adequate remedy or anything more than a step toward a budget consideration, and I have not sought to press it at this time because of the tremendous tasks that are placed upon Congress and the Government in connection with the prosecution of this war. To undertake a reform of that magnitude, a reform that did not meet with the universal acquiescence of the House, would have been simply to cripple and not help in the presentation of great financial bills. No man at this time desires to be chairman of the appropriating committee carrying the power to appropriate for all departments unless he could have behind him the support of the entire membership of the House. To have undertaken that reform, even though a majority of this Congress favored it, and then to have been faced with a minority that was opposed to and sullen because of such a change would have been to so cripple the efficiency of the committee having charge of appropriations as to have practically destroyed it; and realizing that, it would have been folly on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations now to urge that reform. But I am not willing that the absence of any action should be construed as a permanent acquiescence in the present system.

But even the putting of all power into the hands of the Committee on Appropriations or any other committee would of itself be of little value unless it was accompanied, first, by the presentation of estimates from the administrative branch of the Government in budget form, and second, the consideration by the Congress of those estimates in their totals, as well as in their separate details.

It is a simple fact that there is nothing required except an Executive order in order immediately to put into effect an administrative consideration of estimates from a budgetary standpoint. At present all estimates are made by the heads of the various departments, and they go to the various Cabinet officials, who in turn give them to the Secretary of the Treasury, who transmits them to Congress. He transmits them without any power to review them to change them, but simply as the messenger through which they reach Congress. Nothing is needed except the desire of a President—and this has been true always—to have consideration at his council chamber of those estimates as they come from the various departments in their relationship to each other, and the giving to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to act as a real financial head of the Government with power to supervise and control the estimates of the various departments. And until that reform is undertaken by the administrative end of the Government no real budgetary system can be put into effect. That fact should be borne in mind by those who are so free unintelligently to criticize the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. If the budget system were in effect to-day and this committee was called upon to report simply on the request of the department under the budget system, this bill would carry $523,572,000 more than it does.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not necessarily. Congress would not have to vote all that was asked, simply because asked, as a result of a budgetary consideration by the administrative officers

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want to be diverted into too long a talk on this question, because I have so much to present in connection with the bill. I yield briefly.

Mr. MONDELL. My recollection is that President Taft at one time made something of an effort along this line. I do not know whether he had a Cabinet consideration of estimates or a personal consideration by the President.

Mr. SHERLEY. Every President has had a certain consideration by the Cabinet and by himself of the estimates made by the different departments in their relation to each other, but there has never been a Secretary of the Treasury with the power to revise and control the estimates of other departments. I called attention, in a speech made a number of years ago during the administration of Mr. Taft, to the effort that was made by John Sherman as Secretary of the Treasury to obtain just that power and the opposition it met with from every other Cabinet official, an opposition which served to prevent the reform being adopted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman stated that he believed that it would not be wise to have the appropriations in the hands of one committee so long as there was an active minority opposed to it. I assume those views are limited to the duration of the war.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably. I did not mean to make it so broad as to say that because there was always somebody objecting that therefore it should not be done; but I did mean to say that at this time to undertake a reform of that magnitude without the general consent of everybody would be to simply confuse and not clarify the situation.

Mr. LENROOT. I thought that was what the gentleman had in mind.

Mr. SHERLEY. And as a practical man I tried to recognize that situation. The true idea of a budget is one that requires the consideration of expenditures in their relationship not simply to the merit of the activity proposed but also the relative merit of one activity as compared to another, and this consideration in its relationship to the fundamental one of the ability of the country properly to stand the taxation necessary to pay for the expenditures made. In other words, in peace times, after determining the desirability of expenditures, the amount of them that are to be made should be determined by the burden that they will place upon the Nation.

But in war times just the converse of that proposition becomes true as to the large expenditures, because in time of war you have to consider not what you properly can do, but what you must do. We make appropriations at this time of war not with regard to the burden that they will place upon the people of America, but we make them with regard to the requirements of prosecuting and winning the war and because that is superlative every other consideration must give way. So there is an entirely different relationship in regard to expenditures in war times than what they are in peace times, and the need for a budget in a peace-time sense does not exist in war time.

Now, there is another matter in connection with the budget that is very important for the Congress to consider whenever we get to a period where consideration can be given to other than war matters. No man trusts an agent that he can not control. Under our system of government the legislative branch does not control the administrative agents of the Government. We can deny them moneys, but except to a very limited sense we have nothing to do with the selection of the various agents who carry out the various policies. If a member of the Cabinet is carrying on work in an unsatisfactory way to the Government, Congress has no control over him, or rather has no control by which he can be removed and other of its choice selected. It can simply express its lack of confidence by refusing moneys, but the President alone can determine the personnel. Now, the result of that has always been, and probably always will be, to cause a certain amount of friction between the legislative and administrative ends of government, and as a result of that the legislative end has undertaken to prevent what it thought would be abuses of power by constant limitations and by classifications and enumerations, so that our supply bills have become so detailed that the committees dealing with them and the Congress dealing with them spend days and weeks and months in consideration of details that ought not to concern Congress at all, because just to the extent that the Congress is forced to give its time annually to little details—the number of clerks, the salaries they shall be paid, and the internal organization of this bureau and that bureau—just to that extent will it cease to have a voice in the great policies of the Government. And that is what has been happening for the past 40 years in America.

More and more Congress spends hours and days of debate touching clerks' salaries and less and less touching the great policies of the Nation. If this body, the responsible representative body in a true democracy, is to have the power it ought to have, it must have time to deal with the big things and not the need of dealing with the small things. Now, in order that that may happen we must have a reform in the methods of governmental bookkeeping. At present your governmental bookkeeping is for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is to prevent embezzlement or misappropriation of funds, and it performs that service exceedingly well, but it performs no other. All of your appropriations are so made and your bookkeeping accounts so kept that they serve only in preventing Smith or Brown from spending money for some purpose other than that for which it was appropriated, but do not require or show economy of expenditure. There is no system by which the legislative body could take the expenditures of a previous period and from them determine whether they have been economically or wastefully expended; and as a result, in order to ascertain that, we go through a cross-examination of individuals that amounts at times to a severe grilling of them and frequently without obtaining any real result. When we find some abuse we come in and recommend a particular provision prohibiting the doing of something that we think brought on the abuse and we tie the hands, or try to tie the hands, of an incompetent administrative officer, and then wake up a few weeks afterwards and find we have also tied the hands of all the good administrative officers as well and that the bad administrative officer has usually found some method of circumventing the prohibition that we placed upon him. I remember a great speech made by Roosevelt some years ago in which this was the dominant thought, that you can not tie a man's hands and prevent him from doing harm without at the same time preventing him from doing good.

Now, our Government was built in the beginning upon the theory that all power would be abused and that the only remedy for the abuse of power was so to divide it as to prevent anyone from doing much harm, and, incidentally, we succeeded as well in preventing a great many people from doing much good, and if it was not for the practicability of the people of America in overriding mechanical obstacles that are constantly put in their way we would have more difficulty than we have. Now, if you will get a system so you can know whether an administrative officer is well or badly performing his functions, then the remedy will be not to curtail his power, but to cut off his head when he does not deliver. [Applause.] When he fails to show that he is an efficient officer let him go into the discard and let some man of capacity take his place. [Applause.] That is the tendency of all modern government everywhere except here on this floor and in national matters.

Mr. MADDEN. What suggestion has the gentleman to offer?

Mr. SHERLEY. The whole tendency of modern governmental thought is to put responsibility and power together, and then the people, knowing who is responsible, know how to remedy matters when things go wrong.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the gentleman's remedy; how is the gentleman going to reach the question that he is talking about now; how is he going to get control over the executive branch of the Government through the Congress so as to compel them to be efficient, economical, and effective?

Mr. SHERLEY. Part of it can not be done without a great change in our organic law. Part of it can be done by one of the suggestions I have just made, and that is a system of bookkeeping that will enable committees to see what has been done in the previous year without going through the labor that we go through now. We have to examine into everything now in order to find out anything that may be wrong. A proper system of cost keeping, a modern system, whereby you find what it costs to perform a given activity would enable a committee reviewing the activities of the Government for any previous period to determine whether it had been economically done or not, and then when it found it had not been so performed, it could very easily deal with that particular situation, and it would not have to spend the time it now does in going into every detail. It could then appropriate moneys in lump sums very much larger than we have done in the past.

There has grown up an idea, that I shared here for many years, that it was the wise thing for Congress to appropriate money in great detail specifiying and limiting power of administrative officers. It was the prevalent idea of the committee of which I am a member, and particularly the prevalent idea of the then distinguished clerk of that committee, Mr. Courts, and yet it is an idea that is fundamentally wrong, because it is bound to lead, as it is leading, to worse and worse confusion.

One result is that a good administrative officer has to ask for more money for each purpose than he would have to ask as a total for all purposes, because he is limited and tied, and has no leeway. So what I would like to see is a reform in the methods of keeping the accounts, whereby the committees could check up their activities and fix responsibility, and then we could appropriate money in large sums; and that part of the appropriation which is mechanical could be made each year as it is made in most governments, by a few lines of legislation, without a rewriting of so many clerks of Class A, B, C, and D, and free Congress from spending its time with little, insignificant things. We have reached a time and place in the world's affairs where the Congress of the United States must consider bigger matters than simply the pay of a particular clerk and a particular department.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman was discussing in a way the responsibility of Cabinet officers to Congress. I had a letter the other day from a gentleman who is quite a student, and who suggested in his letter that a change ought to be made whereby Congress, by a vote of lack of confidence in a Cabinet officer, would automatically vacate that office. Would the gentleman think that such an arrangement as that, patterned somewhat after the English system, would be a remedy for what he suggests?

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps so, though it carries with it more changes than just what the suggestion indicates.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In just a moment. I would welcome giving Cabinet officers certain days on the floor of the House of Representatives, and I would do it for two reasons—not only to give the Cabinet officer an opportunity to present his case in the open, but I would also do it because it would give to Congress an opportunity to explode a great many false reputations that have existed in America for a great many years past. [Applause.]

Mr. ROSE. I would like to ask the gentleman if by what he has just said he intended to convey the idea that he favors great appropriations rather than enumerating the causes for which the money is appropriated?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I do not. I mean to say that when you have a system of bookkeeping by which you can tell when a man is not only disregarding the purpose for which moneys are given, but also when he has expended them unwisely and extravagantly, that then we can afford to appropriate in large sums with less specification, because every adminstrative officer will know that on his head rests the responsibility of having those moneys properly expended and that he can not hide or shirk that responsibility.

Mr. ROSE. In what manner then would you bring before the Congress the items making up the appropriations asked for?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would bring them as we are bringing some now, but by the reform we would not be doing it without Congress knowing anything about it half the time. Dozens and dozens of items are being carried in great lump sums, and have been carried in years past, because if we were to specify all of them we would simply do nothing else. Take ordnance, and you vote a thousand million dollars to ordnance officers to expend. Even in the old days you voted five to ten millions of dollars to them in three or four lines. Now, you had to trust those officials in the expenditure of those appropriations. And then you would turn around and specify to the last degree how many people those ordnance officers should have as clerks in their offices. You gave them the control over millions and millions, and said, "You are not worthy of being trusted to say whether you ought to have five or seven clerks in the administration of that fund." And if you can get folly worse than that, I have yet to see it. And you did it without any system of bookkeeping and report to Congress whereby you could tell how well or poorly the work was being done and only by examinations that a few committees occasionally made as to some expenditures did you learn some of the facts that ought to be plainly shown by periodical statements.

What has been the result? When the great war broke there happened just what I prophesied three years ago would happen, namely, a breakdown at the desk of these administrative officers, not because they were inefficient, not because the Government was not efficient in the sense that term is used ordinarily, but because Congress had refused for years to give a sufficient corps capable of expending quickly and dealing with a great matter such as was thrust upon it. And every man who wants to be honest must admit it. And yet there is always a tendency here to blame the other man for failures and never to look into our own hearts to see how far we are to blame for those things.

But I do not desire now to deal further with the subject of the budget. I hope to make to the House some time a speech at some length dealing with that alone. However, I did not want as chairman of the committee to present my first bill and totally ignore this very important subject.

I desire now to address myself to the bill. It is one of great magnitude. It is a bill that carries in the way of cash an authorization for more money than used to be expended in the entire running of the Government for a fiscal year. In other words, as a matter of deficiency, to make up the things that were overlooked or could not be anticipated, we are now appropriating more money than we formerly appropriated for the entire conduct of the Government for a year. And that is but an illustration of this great essential fact, that should be borne in the minds of all men in responsible place, that the most difficult thing that has come to a public man now, to-day, is to keep a proper perspective, to realize something of the magnitude of affairs in the great drama that is being played and of which he is a part.

I could stand on this floor for hours and speak nothing that was not literally true, and speak nothing that was not critical of the prosecution of this war; and yet my speech would be false. And I could stand here for a day and speak of nothing that was not complimentary and to the credit of the administration of this war, every word of it being true, and yet my speech would be false. And so it is very easy for gentlemen to find things that are wrong. It is very easy to enumerate what seems a great many things that are wrong and thereby conclude that everything is wrong, and yet the facts, the real facts, would not warrant it, because the only way to judge is to judge not of some, but all, to know not simply the truth, but all the truth, if you are going to pass real judgment upon what has been done.

Now, perhaps at no place in this Government does there come in the course of time more information, scattered and from many directions, but still more information touching the prosecution of this war, than at the committee table of the Committee on Appropriations, because that committee last fall made all the war appropriations, and this year it has had to consider, as it always has considered, deficiencies; and in considering deficiencies, of necessity you have had to consider the various activities of the different departments. Men get impressions as the result of months of testimony and talk with many men. I have some impressions touching this war and touching the country's condition. There are so many men who have volunteered to play the rôle of critics and of panegyrists that it does not seem necessary for me to adopt either rôle, and I shall not attempt it to-day. But it may not be amiss if I should state what to my mind consitutes the great problem in the efficient prosecution of this war and on the doing of which will depend from now on how well or how badly we play our part. Three words describe three things involved, and they are all intimately linked together—ships, cars, storage.

The latter, people have not thought a great deal of, and yet it is one of the things that has served to accentuate the difficulties relative to the other two. If you have a superabundance of cargo space, and if you have a rail transportation system more than adequate, storage becomes a negligible proposition. But to the extent that either rail transportation or ocean transportation is deficient, to that extent does storage become of the first importance, because if it be deficient it simply serves to put an added burden upon rail and ocean transportation and to make even greater the deficiency in those two branches.

Now, that is what has occurred in large measure in connection with this war. This country has not had for the past 10 years or more an adequate transportation system—rail transportation system—and it was perfectly apparent to every thoughtful man—and if you will hunt through the files of debates here and of speeches elsewhere you will find that time and time again attention has been called to the fact—that whenever this country got into the full tide of prosperity and of economic development and of output the rail transportation would prove totally inadequate. Well, the rail transportation was not only called upon to deal with what might be called the output of ordinary good times, but it was required to deal with an expansion such as the country had never known. We had been expanding in manufacture here in America before we went into the war, and since to an extent never dreamed of before, and that in turn has made an output vastly greater—a tonnage output—than what existed shortly prior to that, when there had been a lessening of industrial activity in the country.

In connection with that absence of rail transportation facilities was an antiquated system of storage and of wharfage and port facilities. We never have had for many decades a great ocean carrying fleet, the reasons for which are manifold, and I will not now undertake to speak of them; but everyone was conscious of the fact that the country was sorely lacking in ships, and, of course, with the tremendous falling off of tonnage caused by the depredations of the U-boats the tonnage of the world has become inadequate, and of necessity that presented a problem of first importance.

Now, we had the railroads unequal to their burden; we had unequal storage facilities, and we had a lack of ships.

This was not any particular person's fault; certainly it was not any political party's fault that has been in power only the last few years. But as a result of it, railroad cars became warehouses and piers became warehouses; sheds and piers that were meant to be used for the loading and unloading of freight were used as warehouses for the storage of freight, and there began to pile up thousands and thousands of tons of freight at our eastern seaboard. The situation was made worse by virtue of several other matters. The industrial activity of this country, speaking by and large, is confined in one geographical section. In a big sense the East, the Northeast, and a little section of the Middle West represent the great manufacturing section of America, and as a result of it, it was natural that for an immediate, quick output you had to go into that section.

What has been the result? The result has been that you have placed in three or four States of the Union the great majority of the war orders of the Government. You have added congestion there and a burden there upon transportation that served to disrupt and interfere with transportation everywhere else. That involved your fuel problem. It brought a problem so acute that it was necessary to turn in and take drastic action relative to the use and transportation of coal.

I hold in my hand an outline map of the United States. Gentlemen will see a lot of dots at different places which indicate various contracts for war material that have been placed in America. What does it show? It shows that out of twenty-three hundred odd firms, holding about fifty-odd thousand important war contracts of the Government, a fourth are in New York State, half are in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and three-fourths are in seven States. Is it any wonder that you have a labor problem that is involving the best thought of America in order that these factories may continue their output without diminution?

Is it any wonder that you got a congestion of freight as a result of that? And yet that was not altogether a matter that could have been prevented.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. In the gentleman's opinion does not that same condition accentuate the housing problem that is now one of the important questions confronting the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, yes. That was part of what I meant by the labor problem.

Mr. HARDY. In other words, we ought to try to decentralize some of this Government industry?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is easier to say, perhaps, than to do.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Before the gentleman gets away from this subject of storage in railroad cars, has he any information as to the number of cars that are now held on sidetracks as warehouses?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I have not. I was unable to go into that detail. I am afraid I have gone into so much detail now in the hearings that I am liable to make the mistake that I was accusing the Congress of making—thinking too much of little things and not enough of big ones.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Let me say, I have read somewhere that there were 700,000 cars held for storage purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not really know, and, of course, the number would change from day to day. My understanding is that there has recently been a very great relief of the situation, due to the drastic action that was taken in connection with fuel; and I know from a talk I had not later than this morning that the conditions at the seaboard are very greatly improved, and that steps are actually being taken which warrant the assertion that that situation, to the extent that it is solvable—because there are certain conditions which you can not change—is being solved.

Mr. SNYDER. I should like to say to the gentleman, however, that I have just come back from central New York, and the embargo conditions up there are exactly the same as they have been for the past five or six weeks. There has been practically no relief there.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be; but again I suggest that you have to look at the whole picture and not at one part of it. You can take a dime and hold it close enough to your eye to shut out the entire horizon.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSS. Does not the gentleman think a mistake has been made in shipping goods from the point of production down to the eastern seaboard before they were ready to put them on board the ships, thereby congesting a large amount of goods in the East here?

Mr. SHERLEY. In some measure that is true.

Mr. FOSS. Thereby necessitating the building of these warehouses.

Mr. SHERLEY. In a measure that is true. Yet it is only fair to say that some of the very manufacturing firms in the gentleman's country and elsewhere have been insisting that they be permitted to ship goods so as to get them out of their way so that they could go on producing others. It is so easy to stand here looking backward and say, "This, that, or the other thing should have been done"; but we all learn by experience. One of the real problems has been to coordinate production with transportation facilities, both by rail and by water, and in turn to coordinate transportation facilities with men—with men at the front.

The critic in one breath wants to know why you do not put more men across the water. He rarely knows how many men are there, or how many men are going, but the less he knows about either fact the more he cries out, "Why are they not going across the water?" And then in the next breath he wants to know why on earth you congest the freight at your ports of embarkation. The men who go across the water determine the amount of freight that has to go to the coast and how fast it has to go there. These things are tied together in such a way that it is not easy to solve them. Now, there is in this bill an appropriation of $100,000,000, with a contract authorization of $50,000,000, for the purpose of acquiring storage facilities on the Atlantic coast and in the interior. Gen. Goethals, who is now in charge of the Quartermaster's Department, and is also an acting member of the staff in charge of storage, came before the committee with a proposition looking to the expenditure of that amount of money. He very frankly stated that he was not prepared to give to the committee all of the details of that proposal, but as a member of the New York Port and Harbor Development Commission he had become familiar particularly with conditions there, and he and other gentlemen were making studies of conditions generally, and he said it was perfectly apparent that that amount, and probably a greater amount of money, would be needed in order to create the proper storage facilities. I want to say in passing that some of this work is going on now, and that this remedy is not awaiting the passage of this bill, for which I am glad.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the storage problem acute on foreign shores?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a problem there, but it is separate from what I am talking about now. I shall be glad to speak of it a little later.

The committee did not undertake to limit or to tie the expenditure of this amount of money. We were not in a position, and I do not think Congress is in a position, to determine where and how the storage facilities should be acquired; but we propose, in the voting of this money, that the administrative officers may have the means, and then upon them will rest the responsibility of supplying the country with proper storage facilities. The plan as stated by Gen. Goethals was only tentative, and therefore was subject to some revision, and I understand informally has received some revision. It looked to 30 days' storage capacity at the coast and six months' or less capacity in the interior. That is tied to a plan touching transportation of troops abroad, and I do not feel that I ought to undertake to enumerate in detail the amount of material and supplies that they should carry with them; but it is hoped and believed that this will result in giving us such storage facilities as will make unnecessary undue delays in transportation by rail or by boat. It requires but a moment's thought to realize that if in the loading of a vessel you take two or three days longer than you ought, or if in the unloading of it you take two or three days longer than you ought, you have to just that extent reduced the number of ships you have in over-seas transportation, and to any extent that you can accelerate the loading and unloading of ships, to that extent you have added to your tonnage, because you make more trips possible with the same ships.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the committee consider the wisdom or unwisdom of concentrating this storage business at one port along the coast of the United States?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the committee did not. The committee did not believe—perhaps that is putting it too broad—but I do not believe I have sufficient capacity or the time to qualify me to pass upon that matter. The statement was made in the hearings that in a large measure six different ports would be developed for the use of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is a general impression that the concentration of the war business of the country at one port has been responsible for much of our transportation difficulties.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true, and it is also true that that impression usually represents nothing but the selfishness of a locality not favored. There is an impression abroad that there is too much shipbuilding in Philadelphia. I do not share that belief, but that is the impression caused by the greed of other localities that would like the business; and it is that same sort or narrow viewpoint that makes men complain, without looking at the whole picture, because their locality does not happen to be the favored locality.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There may be some natural advantages elsewhere, apart from other reasons. Why should other points, like Charleston, Savannah, Norfolk, Jacksonville, Baltimore, Boston, and Philadelphia be left out of consideration?

Mr. SHERLEY. In the first place, the gentleman has assumed a premise which I do not think exists, and, in the second place, if I was able to answer him I would know the whole problem, and I do not. I do not know what place ought to be used; I have not the information and could not get it short of six months' study.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been said here—the gentleman did not say it—that as much as $25,000,000 might be spent in extending the storage facilities at one port.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would not be at all surprised, and I have no doubt it would be justified. If the gentleman will permit, I will read him the ports that are going to be used. I will say this, further, to him, that, whether he likes it or does not, you can not possibly take away the primacy of New York as a great port of embarkation. You can not do it, not simply because of the port, but you can not do it on account of the trade conditions and the rail conditions and a lot of other things that can not be changed overnight. It may be, and probably is, exceedingly unfortunate for war purposes that there grew up in America transportation methods and systems and ports and cities without relationship to war needs, but they have; and, these facts being so, we can not run away from them, and men who start to criticize ought to remember them in their criticisms.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman pardon me for one more question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, I do not mean my answer to apply personally to the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand that. I did raise the question of the wisdom of this concentration. It seemed to me a fair question whether it is wise, from a governmental viewpoint or from a military standpoint, to concentrate all shipping business at one place. The possibility of the enemy making an attack on that point adds to the seriousness of the question.

Mr. SHERLEY. I question whether that is a matter that the Committee on Appropriations could decide. I do not think it could come to a wise conclusion, for it has not the means. I read from the hearings, page 503, where Gen. Goethals says:

> In the general scheme, as I have outlined it, we contemplate using Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Newport News as a part of the Norfolk scheme, and Charleston.

I am assuming that Gen. Goethals and the gentlemen associated with him, men distinguished for their achievements in private business life, have worked out a scheme that is proper and practicable. If they have not, we are that much to the worse; but I am satisfied that a better one can not be worked out by legislative enactment.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does not that scheme involve practically the utter neglect of every port west of the Mississippi River and, in fact, west of Florida?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I think it does, in a large measure.

Mr. HARDY. Would not that leave the transportation that ought naturally to come down the western section of the country for export, leave it unprovided for, and tend to congest—the very thing that the gentleman complains of?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I think not; and for the very plain reason that if the gentleman will take a map and draw the distance from Galveston or New Orleans to France, then draw a line from Charleston, one from Baltimore, one from Philadelphia, one from Boston, I think he will get his answer, bearing in mind that the longer a ship takes to go across the sea the less number of trips it can make.

Mr. HARDY. But if you are so congested with freight in the eastern ports that you can not get the ships unloaded, you have destroyed your transportation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, if you can not move it out of New York, you had better move it at New Orleans, but this $150,000,000 is to make it more expeditious to move it to these various ports and to get it across the water.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. I was in New York the other day talking with quite a number of men on this very subject, and they said that there was a considerable quantity of munitions passing through New York that they would be glad to have passed through the port of Philadelphia.

Mr. SHERLEY. All I can say, and I do not want to seem discourteous—as I may seem to have been in my desire to be emphatic—I think this problem will be worked out by those who have the time and who have the information very much better than we can hope to work it out on the floor of Congress.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the gentleman leaves this subject of unloading ships, I want to say that he may recollect the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], which came under his personal observation, that the unloading of a ship of steel goods at a port in France took 60 days.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is possible, and one of the reasons was that in the loading of that ship on this side it was loaded without any real knowledge of the problem of unloading it, or, even if the knowledge existed, without the facilities to get it loaded properly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That ship could probably have made two complete trips in that time.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I think that one of the problems that the War Department now has under serious consideration is the unloading of ships across the water, and that, too, is complicated by the fact that their port facilities are very limited.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am aware of that, and we are carrying moneys for that in this bill. Part of the moneys being provided for the Engineer Department are for the purpose of improving facilities abroad in the unloading of ships and in the transportation and movement to the front of the munitions that go there. That illustrates another proposition, that the same men who now as critics complain about the lack of port facilities in France are the same distinguished gentlemen who insisted upon putting fighting men on the front, and who interfered by their agitation with the orderly plan of developing facilities for handling troops before you put the troops there in great mass. You can not eat your cake and have it, too. You can not do certain things except at the expense of other things, and there has been much childish and unreasoning criticism by men who have insisted on a thing being done without realizing that when done it prevented something else of equal or greater importance. But that is to be expected because we are dealing with big matters that are beyond the ken of most of us, and mistakes necessarily are made, and mistakes are imagined when they are not made.

I want to pass now from this desultory statement, touching what I believe to be, as I have stated, the most important phase of our war problem, to a consideration of the details of the bill itself. The estimates as submitted to Congress amounted in the way of appropriations and authorizations to $1,635,792,341.64. The total of the amount of appropriations and authorizations granted is $528,572,259.18 less than that sum. The amount of direct apprpriations is $907,397,259.18 less than the amount of direct appropriations requested, and the amount of authorizations granted is $378,825,000 more than the amount of authorizations requested. That means that we have very greatly cut the amount of money appropriated and we have considerably increased the amount of contract authorizations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one hour more, in the hope that I shall not use it all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope to do that within one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for one hour more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. As I stated, we have increased the authorizations and decreased the cash, but we have decreased both authorizations and cash by more than $500,000,000. It is proper that some general explanation should be given of so marked a cut as that. Let me say in advance that that cut, in the judgment of the committee, is made without in any sense impairing in the slightest degree the efficient prosecution of the war. No moneys anywhere were denied for any purpose that it was believed were necessary for the prosecution of the war, and no member of the committee permitted any belief or hope as to an early termination of the war to control him in voting, because, manifestly, no more fatal mistake could be made than to undertake to act upon the belief that the war might end at an earlier period than the facts may warrant.

Mr. MADDEN. How does the gentleman account for the wide difference of opinion between the executive heads of the Government and the committee on the matter of the amount of money needed?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am going to explain that in a moment. Two hundred and ninety million dollars of that cut is represented in a clothing estimate, which was not allowed for this reason. But little if any of that money will be needed prior to the 1st of July, and this bill is a deficiency bill to make provision for the needs of the various departments up to July 1.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. SHERLEY. In just a moment. I think I will anticipate the question. The Army and the Navy have a right to incur deficiencies to any amount necessary in connection with clothing and are ordering and have ordered all the clothing that is believed necessary. Therefore, the giving of this amount would have no value in speeding up in the slightest degree the matter of clothing, and it was thought desirable that the actual amount that should be necessary to pay the clothing bill should be left to the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs, that deals with it under our present system, in connection with the Army bill, or if by chance later on it is necessary to consider it as a deficiency, there will be of necessity another deficiency bill, when the Appropriations Committee could do so more accurately than now, so we just cut it out of this bill entirely. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. In view of the general information that is in the possession of everyone to the effect that most of the men in the cantonments have only one suit of clothes and only one pair of shoes, it would seem as if it would be very wise to allow the money so that they could pay for the shoes and the clothing they have to have in order to supply the needed clothing to the men who are already short.

Mr. SHERLEY. It would seem so, if either of the gentleman's statements was warranted by the situation, but they are not in my judgment. I do not think conditions are anything like what the gentleman states touching either shoes or clothing, but if they were the refusal of an appropriation of this money would not interfere one iota with the procurement of one shoe or one shoe lace or one coat or button on a coat, and if the gentleman will think for just a moment touching the power that exists in the Army and Navy to incur deficiencies for clothing purposes he will realize that my statement is true.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that, if the gentleman will allow me, but at the same time they ought to be paid for the things they supply.

Mr. SHERLEY. They will be. Their bills will not come in until after July. I have not heard of any clothing manufacturer who was not being paid if his bill was properly presented and audited. There is plenty of cash in the Treasury available for that purpose now. Now, to go on with the items showing cuts. Armories and arsenals, there was a cut of two and a half million dollars, and that is due to the elimination of certain matters which on reconsideration by the department were not pressed at this time and do not represent any real denial of moneys for any needed facilities. Transportation of the Army was cut $70,000,000, and it was cut that amount because of facts which were presented touching the probable transportation of men. It was not believed the amount was needed that was asked to the extent of $70,000,000. That is necessarily an estimate. Nobody can estimate accurately, but it had to be based somewhat upon the transportation that had taken place during the past six months and on the estimate of the next six months. Obviously, the amount for transportation the first six months would not be needed in the second because of the cost the first six months of assembling of all of our present Army, but if more moneys are needed for that purpose it will be met as needed. There is some transportation that can be a matter of abuse, and it was thought wise that Congress should appropriate what seemed to be a sufficient amount without putting moneys at the disposal of the department beyond what was needed.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Does this transportation money apply to the moving of enlisted men between now and the 1st of July?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is the gentleman taking into consideration the possibility of the next draft being earlier than the 1st of July?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. That was part of the theory on which the whole item was based. Whether we have made a correct conclusion is difficult to say, but that item was presented, as I recall, by Col. Daly, of the War Department, and the cut that we made represents an agreed judgment of his and the committee, and if it be an error it is one that will be corrected without difficulty.

Mr. TILSON. As a matter of fact, I was trying to get at whether the gentleman had any information or whether it is possible at this time to tell whether the draft would be made the 1st of May or the 1st of July, and that might make a large difference in this item.

Mr. SHERLEY. My impression is, and I would not like to say it was more than an impression, that it contemplated that a draft would be made prior to July. Of course, not the calling in of all of these men but some portion of them. But that is just an impression, and I may be in error, because the gentleman will appreciate there is a lot of testimony that goes out of one's head.

Mr. TILSON. I am perfectly aware that it is not probably known by anybody whether that will be done at one time or another.

Mr. SHERLEY. Storage and shipping facilities. There is a cut there of $35,000,000, and that was really due to a duplication in large measure of estimates. I have spoken of the appropriation of $100,000,000 with $50,000,000 authorization to the Quartermaster General for this purpose. His estimate was made after some estimates had been made and submitted in detail for storage at various places, and the bigger scheme swallowed up the smaller, and this $35,000,000 was deducted.

There were construction items under the quartermaster, $85,000,000. Some of them represented real cuts where the committee did not believe that the amount was needed. For instance, I recal an item of $2,000,000 for painting cantonments. The committee thought if provision was made for painting the outside of the cantonments and a certain amount of interior work it was all that was necessary, and we did not need to spend all the money that was asked for painting both inside and outside of these wooden buildings as a manner of preservation of them, particularly in view of the fact that nobody at this time was in a position to say for how long these cantonments would be used. There was an item of heating of garages for motor vehicles, $3,000,000. The committee did not allow it because before this bill can become a law and long before these heating plants could be had, the weather itself will make unnecessary any heat for the garages. Now, this coming winter it may be necessary to heat some of these garages to prevent freezing both of water and gasoline in the tanks of many of these motors that are housed there and to enable men to work in them. But that was a matter which could go over. It was not so pressing as to be work that needs to be done now, as contemplated in a deficiency bill that provides only to July 1. There were some repairs at some camps which were cut, some items as to repair shops, where we did not think that a sufficient case was made to warrant the increase of facilities at those camps in that particular. There was a cut of a half a million in the operation of camp utilities. There was a request for an additional cantonment of $8,185,000 and a cantonment for Ordnance personnel of $4,460,000 that were eliminated because there was nobody at this time prepared to state where they were to be and when they were needed.

There was a cut touching refrigerator plants of $5,000,000, because that is carried in the lump-sum appropriation touching storage facilities There was for military posts and exchanges a cut of $250,000; barracks and quarters, seacoast posts, a cut of $2,209,000, which represents that much error in the presentation of the estimates, which were checked up and caught up by the gentleman presenting the estimates and the committee.

In the Medical Department there has been an allowance practically of everything that is asked.

The Army Medical Corps figured originally, I believe—or perhaps it might be more accurate to state that provision was originally made—for a 3 per cent capacity in hospitals at the various camps and cantonments—3 per cent of the total cajacity of the camps and cantonments. The Surgeon General's Department seemed to believe that 5 per cent is now necessary in order to make assurance doubly sure against the sickness that might arise in connection with the training of men in these various camps and cantonments. They also estimated on the basis of 5 per cent capacity to take care of in this country the troops that might be overseas and facilities of 20 per cent capacity to take care overseas of the troops there. The Navy has a large program in the way of hospital facilities, and the Marine Public Health Service have another one. If it related to anything except the health and lives of the boys that are fighting for their country, this committee would have recommended, I have no doubt, considerable cuts in those estimates. It is not always that you find a highly skilled medical officer who also is a fine business man. And the problem confronting the committee in connection with these estimates was not an easy one. We solve it by allowing what was asked, because that solution was along the line of safety for the lives and health of the boys. And perhaps that is about as explanatory a statement as can be made touching the estimates submitted by the various medical departments of the Government.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to ask in regard to just one detail. Does the gentleman's bill carry anything for sewage for hospitals at the National Guard camps?

Mr. SHERLEY. My impression is that it does.

Mr. TILSON. My observation in those camps leads me to believe that that was the thing most needed of all, namely, the sewage disposition from the hospitals of National Guard camps.

Mr. SHERLEY. It carries everything that the medical men are able to think of.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it all contained in this medical department?

Mr. SHERLEY. There are some $18,000,000 contained in the way of construction, repairs, and enlargements of hospitals for the Army. There is quite a considerable sum, several millions of dollars, in the way of enlargement of marine hospitals, under the Public Health Service, and quite a sum in this regard for the Navy. There are the items that are carried under the head of barracks and quarters, and water, sewers, roads and streets, and things of that kind, that would also relate directly or indirectly to matters of sanitation. Then there are certain items touching sanitation of areas outside of camps under the Public Health Service.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I just observed that the items referred to were not in the medical department.

Mr. TOWNER. I notice in the item of water and sewers at military posts the appropriation is over $13,000,000. I will ask the gentleman if that includes cantonments?

Mr. SHERLEY. It includes more than that. These are items that have been allowed. I say "allowed," but it does not very much matter whether the committee thought it ought to be allowed or not. The money has been spent and the thing done, and we are simply paying the bill. I am not saying that in criticism. It is already spent, and ought to have been done, because these things were things of first importance, but manifestly when it came to the committee as a proposition of money spent we had no option as to whether we would vote it or not.

There has been estimated here $36,424,175 under the various heads of barracks and quarters, waters and sewers, regular supplies, roads, walks, wharves, and drainage, construction and repair of hospitals, at the 16 cantonments, and there had been under the similar heads a total of $18,353,194 at the various 16 camps. Then there are a number of items under the same head that relate to work done at other places outside of these 16 cantonments and 16 camps.

Mr. TOWNER. Those are included in other items in the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. "Barracks and quarters" is only carried once in the bill, and it represents money used for cantonments and camps, and also for other purposes. There was submitted to the committee, as the result of a suggestion made at the hearing last fall, a table that undertook to segregate and group these matters, and it is from that table that I have been endeavoring to read.

Perhaps there are some other cuts that ought to be enumerated as being of sufficient magnitude to deserve attention at this time.

In the Provost Marshal's office there was a cut of $2,000,000. That $2,000,000 was a cut because of a request of that amount to reimburse the President's fund, and that brings up a subject that it is well to speak of generally. The President very properly, as occasion arose from time to time in various departments, has advanced moneys to carry on necessary activities. As a very good illustration of that, the War-Risk Insurance Bureau was created by an act of Congress, passed a few days, or a week, maybe, before Congress adjourned. Of necessity no adequate provision could be made by Congress for taking care of that organization. It has grown and is growing, and will continue to grow, by leaps and bounds. It was necessary for the President to advance $500,000 to be used for that bureau in the employment of clerks and procurement of space, and other purposes incident to the organization of the bureau.

So in the case of the Provost Marshal's office, $2,000,000 was advanced; in other bureaus, lesser sums. In some instances, as in these two, requests were made for us to appropriate sums in order that that fund might be reimbursed. The committee concluded not to do that in any instance presented here, not in the slightest as a criticism of the President's use of the fund, for so far as it has come to the attention of the committee there has been no disposition on the part of the Executive to give funds indiscriminately and without thought; but because of a realization that of necessity the President could not watch all of the details, and that it was not intended that the $100,000,000 fund should be a revolving fund, always to be kept at that amount, but was given for the purpose of meeting exigencies as they arose, and that if subsequently there came such a diminution of it as to make it desirable the President should be voted additional sums, Congress would unhesitatingly do it. This Congress and any Congress will always vote to the President of the United States the moneys necessary to meet situations such as this when the country is engaged in war; and, to the great credit of the country, it has never had a President that did not deserve that confidence at the hands of the legislative branch of the Government. [Applause.] But just as a matter of keeping track of things, in order to prevent departments undertaking to get from the President moneys and then spending them without getting the viewpoint of Congress at all, and then coming to Congress and asking that the money be given back by which it could reimburse the President, the committee thought it wise not to recommend such sums, and has not done so.

That explains that cut of $2,000,000 in connection with the Provost Marshal's office.

In the Food and Fuel Administrations there was a cut of $250,000. That is a joint fund, and while both Mr. Garfield and Mr. Hoover expressed the belief and the desire that the fund should be separated and the two departments carried separately in the future, and while the committee believed that that is a proper thing to do, it did not feel like doing it in a deficiency bill when in a few weeks the matter will come up for a more minute examination in connection with the sundry civil bill. We cut the amount asked for because we believed that they did not need the full amount asked. It was not cut with the idea of restricting their activities, but certain estimates were made on the basis of an increased salary roll for a six months' period. This bill will not become a law until, at the best, about four months before the end of the period. Manifestly in many instances there should have been a cut of one-third in connection with salaries and expenses of that sort. In that way will be explained many of these cuts.

Now, there are a great number of other items that come from all the different departments of the Government. It is a time when the war, like charity, is made to cover a multitude of sins, and when a department, whether it has any relationship to the war or not, is glad to take war as an excuse for getting moneys for increasing its activities. So far as we could we tried to check those things, and where we thought moneys were being asked that were not necessary we cut them.

There were certain deficiencies that were perfectly patent. There is quite a deficiency here in regard to soldiers' homes, which was allowed in its entirety. It grew out of the increased cost of food and fuel. It did not require very much of argument to convince anybody who has to pay his own bills that it was costing the Government more money to pay its bills in regard to both food and fuel, and those matters became matters of mathematical calculation in large measure.

There was an estimate of $6,000,000 to furnish seeds to the farmers of the country at cost. That was submitted to the committee and was cut $2,000,000. It was cut $2,000,000 because of a belief that with the $2,500,000 which they have available, and which was voted them last fall, and with the $4,000,000 which will be made available through the passage of this bill they would have as large a fund as was needed. That fund is a revolving fund. One of the questions that came up was how far they would be able to turn over the money. Manifestly they will begin buying right away the seed, and manifestly they will have to sell that seed very shortly, the time being shorter or longer according as the planting season is earlier in one section and later in another section. To a limited extent seeds sold where planting is very early will be sold early enough for the money obtained from those sales to be again used in the purchase of new seeds, and to that extent the fund can be made to go further than its total would indicate. Just how far that may be it is impossible to tell. But believing that there would be some of that, and believing that the estimates proposed were based on a belief a little more gloomy than the facts warranted, because there is always too much rain, or too little, and the weather is never quite right for farming, and things are always going wrong, and still do not always go quite as badly wrong as folks think [laughter], the committee felt warranted in making the reduction indicated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman that in October out in Michigan it rained 28 days out of 31.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no doubt of that, and I have no doubt that the frost has killed all the fruit. It always does. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can say to the gentleman that it has killed a good deal of the wheat.

Mr. SHERLEY. I recognize that; and because it was a concrete situation we undertook to deal liberally with the department. There are sections where the selection and adaptation of certain kinds of wheat and cotton and sorghum are such as to make difficult the procurement of the proper kind of seed, and it is perfectly manifest that the Government must now go into this activity. I also believe it likely that the Government will not lose anything by this expenditure, and that the sales of these seeds shall be as the law contemplates they should be, at such price as to cover the cost of procurement and the actual distribution cost and overhead charge. I would not ordinarily like even this plan of State socialism, but facts are facts, and facts are stubborn things, and we are doing many things now in this war that I hope and believe none of us will be doing or wanting to do, unless it be my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. LONDON], in the days that will come after peace is declared.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am sure that the action of the committee in this regard will be appreciated very much by the farmers, who are trying under these circumstances to produce sufficient crops to serve the needs of the country. But I would like to inquire whether it would be proper for the gentleman to state how the seed will be sold, so that the farmers can avail themselves of it. Will it be sold by the Secretary of Agriculture direct to the farmer or will it be placed in seed houses in the different States so that the purchases can be made through them?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, we did not go into the question fully as to the method of distribution. We did make an inquiry which I think is interesting, and which I think the gentleman will enjoy reading, touching the method of acquiring information as to the amount of seed needed and the method of procurement of the right sort of seed for sale and distribution. I assume that the Agricultural Department will through its own agencies undertake to distribute this seed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suppose it would be very much like the system developed about the distribution of nitrate of soda?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would assume that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yesterday I addressed a letter to the Secretary of Agriculture, asking about the matter the gentleman has referred to.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sure you will get more accurate and fuller information from the Secretary than from me.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it expected to get the bill through both Houses and signed in time for use of the seed in the spring-wheat planting?

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope to get it through the House by Saturday, and I hope it can be passed through the Senate within a week. There is $2,500,000 now that the Secretary has, and, of course, it can be used for the immediate needs, pending these other moneys. Now, gentlemen, I have already taken more time than I expected to. I want to speak to the committee about one matter of great importance.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to ask a question about the policy of the committee. I observe that it has reduced the immediate appropriation, but granted quite liberal authorizations. Is not that unusual in a deficiency bill, to grant such authorizations?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it would be; but this is not a usual deficiency bill. What I mean is that many of the deficiencies are of a different character. We are making contracts in large sums. For instance, the engineers wanted $140,000,000. We gave them $70,000,000 in cash and $70,000,000 authorization, and we did it upon this theory, that while it was necessary for the Engineer Department to be in a position to incur obligations of the Government and let contracts for the procurement of locomotives, rails, and other facilities, amounting to a total of $140,000,000, by no possibility could the bills be presented by July 1. In that connection I will say that the Engineer Department has unpledged a free balance of $114,000,000—and we gave them $70,000,000 more, making $184,000,000 cash, which is more money than they can possibly need to pay bills between now and July 1, and other appropriations could be made afterwards without now tying the Treasury. It is an unfortunate thing to tie the Treasury by positive appropriations to any greater extent than necessary. That was the general policy the committee followed.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Then the authorizations are for contracts between now and July 1?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; while it is a continuing authorization, we were advised that they expected to enter into the contracts before July 1.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The same department asked the Military Committee for $800,000,000 for the year beginning the 1st of July.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but the committee did not undertake to deal with matters that will probably come before the gentleman's committee touching the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. WHALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. WHALEY. Is the nitrate of soda fund to be made a revolving fund?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and the reason for that was developed from a statement contained in a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, that while there was some uncertainty whether he would be able to get ships in order to get additional nitrates, still it was desirable that the fund should be a revolving fund during the war. The committee, realizing that that was true, felt warranted in presenting legislation to that extent, and it is contained in the bill.

Now, gentlemen, one of the problems that confronted the committee, and which was the most difficult in many ways of solution, was the problem in connection with the building program for the District of Columbia. I said awhile ago that it was very much easier to look back and see mistakes than to look forward and see needs. I think one of the big mistakes that Congress made—and perhaps nobody was more responsible for that mistake than myself, unless it was the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald—was that instead of building 1,000,000 square feet of space last year in Henry Park we ought to have built three or four million square feet. We probably would have been denied the request if we had come in with a suggestion of that kind, but that is what ought to have been done. We ought to have taken certain land then available and placed on it buildings to the extent of three or four million square feet of space, and as a result of that we would have had a building plan that would have been more uniform, more permanent, and more desirable than what has taken place and what is now going to take place.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the War Department, or whatever department has jurisdiction, lived within the estimate of the cost of $2,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not entirely; there has been put into this building a sprinkler system in order to lessen, as far as practicable, the danger of fire.

Mr. MADDEN. They would not be able to get insurance unless they did.

Mr. SHERLEY. They do not have any insurance, but it is to lessen the fire danger. By virtue of that fact and some other minor things there have been expenses which will carry the cost of the building over $2 a square foot, which was the estimate, to $2.16 a square foot; and, so, to that extent they have not kept within their appropriation. But that is less than we can build wooden buildings for to-day. In the items we are carrying in the bill for wooden buildings we are figuring on a basis of $2.25 a square foot.

Now, there is at present, occupied by various departments of the Government, 3,826,511 square feet of rented space, or, rather, there was on the 1st of January. This matter changes from day to day and it will keep a man busy to keep up with the changes, but the committee sent out a series of questions to every department and has compiled information as to that data touching rentals. For that space the Government is now paying $1,764,019.40 annual rental. The space obtained lately is costing a dollar or more a square foot. Now, the estimate of space needed by the departments prior to July 1 is 2,109,761 square feet, and that means net.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. As to the value of buildings occupied by the Government, can the gentleman state about what percentage of the value of the building is paid in rentals?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I can not state from my knowledge what that would be. We are paying now, I should say, what a president of a railroad many years ago described as "all the traffic will bear." It is so much higher in some instances that you do not like to think of the extortion.

But they have asked all that they could get, and are still prepared to do so. There is figured as additional space after July and up to the next July of 2,316,270 square feet. The committee has presented a proposal here that has one vice. It is inadequate, but again the committee tried to keep within what would seem to a good many people reasonable bounds. I say inadequate because if this war continues for more than this year, the expansion is going to be away beyond even what that table indicates.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, if these buildings are of a temporary character, or even if they be of a permanent character, they could be so laid out as to extend them without any additional expense in the cost per cubic foot, so that if you prepare for just what you know you need now and you lay your plans for additions that may meet the future needs you would be perfectly safe.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman, if we do that, but unfortunately we think we do it when we do not. Right now the departments are being handicapped, seriously handicapped, for the lack of at least a million square feet of space, that ought to be available this moment, and that is understating the situation. But you know it is hard for men to expand in their minds as fast as events expand for them, and we did not want to bring in here a proposal that looks too extravagant.

Mr. MADDEN. Sometimes what looks to be the most extravagant is the most economical.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman been able to obtain any information as to the length of time it will require to complete the character of buildings the committee recommend for construction?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I am going into all that detail in a moment, which I hope will give the gentleman the information he desires. What we are proposing is that there shall be erected in Seaton Park—and Seaton Park is that part of the Mall that lies immediately to the east of Henry Park, and Henry Park is that part of the Mall where these buildings that were ordered built last year now are, at Sixth and D Streets—that at Seaton Park there shall be constructed one concrete building of 270,000 square feet, and when I speak of square feet I am speaking of gross, not including the walls, but gross in the sense of including halls and other space not used commonly as offices. It is inside wall floor space.

Besides this 270,000 square feet of concrete in Seaton Park, we propose also 370,000 square feet of wooden buildings, all to be three stories in height, the wooden buildings to be of the same style as the buildings now in Henry Park, and the concrete building to be reinforced concrete of a plain design, three stories high, and, of course, entirely fireproof. Then, just beyond the present Henry Park buildings to the west it is proposed to put up a wooden building of 300,000 square feet of space. That would make in that part of the Mall an addition of 940,000 square feet of floor space. The reason for putting one concrete building there was this: Those buildings in Henry Park are now largely used, not entirely, by the ordnance people. Practically a third of those buildings are reserved for the use of the Navy, and they are to give that up under the new plan, which proposes building them a concrete building at Seventeenth and B Streets, to which I shall come in a few moments.

It is evident that the ordnance people will eventually need all of the present space at Henry Park, and will need, in addition to that, considerable concrete space for the certain protection of their records, their drafting force, and drawings. I do not believe that there is any real fire risk in the sense of danger to human life in connection with those buildings. The policing of those buildings, the fire protection in the way of the sprinkler system and otherwise is such, together with the character of the building, which would enable, in case of emergency, the rapid emptying of them, even in case of fire, that there would be no great danger to the people stationed within them.

But there is a fire risk in connection with the records. The people could get out but the records would not get out, and there would be as much delay by virtue of the destruction of certain classes of drawings and records as could possibly come to us in the prosecution of the war. It is therefore highly important that we should have a concrete building there, and if it was not because of the time involved I should favor building only concrete buildings from now on. But the War Department needs immediately a great deal of space. They have stated that if we could supply very shortly some six or seven hundred thousand square feet of space, that that would take care of the acute phase of the situation until we get further relief from the concrete buildings that we are proposing, and so it was planned in this way.

It is proposed at Seventeenth and B Streets—and that is right across from the Pan American Union Building—to place two buildings, one for the Army and one for the Navy, running west toward the river, that shall have a total floor space of 1,775,000 square feet, 940,000 square feet to be for the use of the Navy and 835,000 square feet for the use of the Army. The Navy Building will be sufficient to take care of all of the Navy activities with its prospective expansion, save only that space now occupied in the Navy Annex and for which they have a lease of some years. It might even take care of that, if need be, and that lease might be transferred for the use of other departments. As a result of building these buildings they state that they are able and willing to stay in the present quarters, crowded though they are, and to immediately release for the use of the Army the approximately 300,000 square feet, gross area, down at Henry Park, and so the plan contemplates their release of that and the immediate use of it—it ought to be ready in a few days—by the Army. By this plan the Navy subsequently can, and will, release practically all of the space it now has in the Army and Navy Building for the use of the State Department, which is greatly in need of additional space. After completion of all the buildings here proposed there should be such release of rented space by the Navy and War Departments as would enable other bureaus to be better accommodated, but we have made no certain provision for a number of these, and later adjustments will need to be made of available space. We have made no provision for Treasury needs, but an estimate has been submitted for taking over the Arlington Hotel site and erecting a 10-story building. It came in too late for our consideration, even should the committee desire to consider it.

The estimated cost of the concrete buildings is $3 a square foot. The salvage when these buildings shall have been removed, as eventually they will be removed, will be practically nothing. In other words, what you get for your machinery, windows, sashes, electric fixtures, and other matters that are the subject of salvage will probably not be more than what it will cost for the removal of the concrete buildings.

The cost of the wooden buildings will be $2.25, as best we can figure it. I hope it will be a little under that. As I stated a few moments ago, the Henry Park buildings are going to cost now, with the deficiencies added to them, $2.16. The salvage on the wooden buildings will probably be about 25 cents, so as to make about $2 net for the wooden buildings as against $3 net for the concrete buildings. I think it is important that the committee should keep those figures in mind. The cost is as 2 to 3. Now, these figures were arrived at by consultations with the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds and consultations with the Superintendent of the Capitol, consultations with Gen. Goethals—though I ought to say, in justice to him, that his statement was simply a general statement as to cost without going into the details—and by consultation with the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy, and consultation with one of the officials of the Treasury Department in connection with public buildings. They represent what ought to be the outside cost. The Navy people have actually built concrete buildings at a square-foot cost of $2.50—I mean, under modern conditions at present prices.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did they do that by advertising for their materials according to law?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not answer that, as to whether they did it in this instance or not in that way, but they did it for that figure. It is done largely by having the cheapest kind of construction and by having a plan that makes your ground floor practically rest upon the ground, not requiring the support for it that would be required for the other floors. If there has to be some stepping, owing to the grade, they estimate that the price would run, at the outside, to $3.08, and anywhere between $2.50 and $3.08 is what is figured would be the cost, dependent upon the character of the ground, the amount of grading that would have to be done, the levels that the buildings were to attain, and matters of that sort. The committee took $3 in order to be safe, and it is proposed that these two concrete buildings shall be built under the direction of the Navy Department. The Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy has probably had more experience in concrete buildings than any people outside of the Army engineers in connection with Panama, and river and harbor work, which is rather different work from this. It is believed that it will take from three to five months as the minimum and maximum to build the wooden buildings, and from four and a half or five months to seven months as minimum and maximum for building the concrete buildings. Of course the amount of building of concrete, if it was increased very much more, might delay quite a bit the finishing of all of the work, because the assembling of the sand and gravel and concrete and the steel for reinforcement, and all of those things, go to delay construction, as you gentlemen appreciate without my stating it.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Is it possible for these concrete buildings to be so constructed that the department can be getting into them before their completion?

Mr. SHERLEY. Partly; but these buildings are going to be three-story buildings only in height. They are made three-story buildings for several reasons, but, among others, to hold down the cost, to prevent the need of elevators, and for quickness of completion. Now, it is possible that part of them may be done, or one building may be done sooner than the other, but I am giving you the outside figures touching the program.

Now, some of these buildings are being put on the Mall and some of them on the park area. I could stand here and give you 20 good reasons why you ought not to build on either the Mall or the park if I was hunting simply reasons to criticize a building program, and when I got through somebody might ask me what I would do in lieu of that, and I might have some difficulty in answering that. No one wants to see either the Mall or the parks of Washington disfigured. No one desires to do it for the sake of doing it; but no one with appreciation of the needs of the Nation is going to stop to consider parks in connection with the prosecution of this war. So the committee has no apology to make for proposing to build upon these public areas. The Mall as we have known it is gone forever. I hope that some day will come a bigger and a better one. Some day there may come a scheme whereby we will bring the Mall into the life of the city instead of having it as it is now, and make Pennsylvania Avenue a street to be proud of, a street to rival Princess Street in Edinburgh, with a park on one side and beautiful buildings on the other. But the Mall at present is gone, and the old Mall, spacious in the days of the driving of horses, is to-day so narrow as to be nothing more than a green setting for a few public buildings that are in it; and the great park development of Washington is coming in the Potomac, and the connecting that with Rock Creek, and the driveways that will be measured in many miles instead of in squares.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It occurs to me from the location of the buildings that the gentleman has mentioned that there will be a great congestion. Was that considered by the committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will come to that in a moment. It was considered. If there is any difficulty in connection with this matter that we have not considered, we are not conscious of it, because it was a very difficult problem.

Mr. MADDEN. And the gentleman had to consider transportation facilities in all this?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. Of necessity that also had to be considered. That is one of the determining factors, the proximity to our Government activities, because there is no thing that breeds a waste of time more than scattered activities whereby the man in charge would have to spend half a day in traveling from one place to another. The buildings that will be put at Seventeenth and B Streets will be, by virtue of their bulk, really attractive looking buildings. I think everybody was agreeably surprised at the appearance of those buildings in Henry Park. We had been told that they were going to be so ugly that when they proved not to be that ugly we were rather agreeably surprised.

Now, without adding to the cost there can be made ornamentations of the two faces, that on Seventeenth Street and that on B Street of the first building, and on one face of the second building on B Street, such as will take away from them any ugly appearance. The height is not sufficient to dwarf the Lincoln Memorial, and they do not go far enough back to do it. It took a good deal of nice planning to get buildings of sufficient area and yet so constructed that they would not go back too far toward the Lincoln Memorial or too far to the south to obstruct the vista that should be had of the Lincoln Memorial. The base of the Lincoln Memorial will be almost as high as the roof of these buildings, and in order that we might not again have the unreasoning hysteria touching smokestacks, a hysteria and propaganda of supersensitive art critics of the country which resulted in the inexcusable delay of a power plant that is much needed now, we propose to have the power plant of these buildings next to the brewery on the river, and if it can detract any from the beauty of the brewery we are not aware of the fact. I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have always been very much struck with the fact that the most beautiful view back of the White House was toward Arlington, and I want to know whether any of these buildings have been placed so as to interrupt that view?

Mr. SHERLEY. They have not. One of the proposals that was made was to use the ellipse, that is the loop beyond the rear of the White House. That was rejected. Another proposal was to put the buildings in an L shape around the Monument, occupying some of the space that is now occupied by the swimming pool there. That was thought undesirable, and impracticable except at great expense in the construction because there used to be a great pond there, and it meant a lot of filling, and the spreading of your bases over a very much larger area.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. My recollection is that the Lincoln Memorial is nearly in line with the portico in the rear of the White House and Arlington.

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. With the house at Arlington.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is not. Here is the White House. Here is the Ellipse. Here is the Washington Monument, and Arlington is off here [illustrating on map].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. To the left of that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Here is the Lincoln Memorial.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is more in the direction of Arlington.

Mr. SHERLEY. Here is where these buildings will be put.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think it would interfere with that vista, and I wish the gentleman would look at it——

Mr. SHERLEY. I have several times.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman does not think that the view from the rear of the White House toward Arlington is interrupted by these buildings?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am answering the gentleman that it is not, in my judgment. Existing buildings would interrupt the view if it be as the gentleman thinks. Here is the Pan American Building. This here is a new building, and this is a building under way, and there is another one under way here. Here is another building proposed. All of this area which ought to have been taken last year and on which should have been placed one great series of large buildings of concrete has been taken by various departments on account of the need and covered with wooden buildings. These proposed buildings could not of necessity interfere with the view of Arlington. That would not be interfered with, if it be not interfered with already by the buildings that are there.

Now, some one inquired, and it was a proper inquiry, in connection with transportation facilities. Well, it looks like no matter where we live or work we have to walk if we want to be on time. But assuming that the street car companies will have waked up to their obligations and deal with them adequately, the places selected do not present difficulties as great as would be had if they were put elsewhere. It is proposed now that one of the electric street car lines shall come down—it now comes down Pennsylvania Avenue and on G Street—it is proposed that it shall make a loop in here and strike Virginia Avenue, and then come on back and up again so that all of these buildings would be within two or three squares of that car line. They are now within a few squares of the Pennsylvania Avenue line and have only a couple more squares from the F Street line on Seventeenth and H.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman pardon just one more question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And then I will subside. Was the housing proposition considered at the time that these buildings were located?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman means the housing of employees?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The housing of employees.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; that has been thought about.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because there are now bills being considered requiring hundreds of millions of dollars for the housing of employees here and elsewhere.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have thought a great deal about it, and I think the committee has thought about it somewhat. I believe that it is going to be desirable to build on some areas between the Capitol and the Union Station some women's hotels of concrete, which can be built there from plans which I have seen, I believe, at a cost of $500 a room, and each of these buildings contemplates about 1,500 rooms capacity, with the proper parlor floor, and perhaps a gymnasium or swimming pool included in it.

I think that it is essential that this Government should do something looking particularly to the housing of some of the women employees of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am glad to get the gentleman's idea.

Mr. SHERLEY. I say "women employees," because the necessity of the situation that confronts them is more difficult than that which confronts men. Men who are worth their salt can usually find somewhere to sleep and take care of themselves, and if all the clerks, both women and men, would consider somewhat living over in the Southeast instead of everybody trying to congest up in the Northwest, they would help to solve a great deal of the problem in connection with the housing of employees. But something ought to be done in regard to the women employees, and I hope there may. We did not go into it to present any real plans to the House at this time. We have presented a plan——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for 10 minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. We have not undertaken to bring out a plan for the housing of employees.

Now, I think I am warranted in asking this of the House: Even though this building plan does not represent just what the individual Member might have thought desirable, to bear in mind that it is the result of a month of very hard, conscientious work. It represents the judgment of the committee, and when I say the judgment of the committee, I mean that. It represents not simply the judgment of the majority members, but equally of the minority members. It is the most practical thing we could work out.

These buildings ought to be, to the extent that they can be, built of concrete, for two reasons, both of them important. First, the absolute security to life and property; and, second, buildings sufficiently permanent, though not intended to be kept for all time, as will take care for a few years after the war closes of all of the needs of the departments; because we are never going back to the old condition that we knew in Washington. You will never go back to the old size of governmental activities. You will never see the Washington that you knew three or four years ago. There will go up in this city, from selfish interests, a great cry to immediately build great monumental buildings that will take considerable time, and in the meanwhile to tear down anything that they can tear down, in order to continue the very profitable business that was illustrated in a rent account of $1,700,000 for 3,000,000 square feet of floor space, much of which is not office space at all, but really storage space.

The committee felt that it would be derelict in its duty if it did not present to the House a building program that had enough permanency to give the Government some little leeway and not hold it subject to the greed of men renting space to it. If we have erred, we have erred on the side of conservatism. We would rather not have had to go on the park areas at all. But if you take the areas that are full of buildings now and tear them down, laying aside the cost of acquiring the land, you will postpone by a month, two months, or three months the procurement of these buildings; and time is money now. Therefore the committee presents this in the hope that it may have the approval and indorsement of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question concerning a subject in this bill on which he has not touched. I observe there is a deficiency appropriation for heavy cannon. If I recall correctly, we appropriated last year something like $2,100,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken in his assumption. There is an item of $676,000 under the head of "Field artillery," which he assumes is for heavy cannon. In point of fact, it is for mortars.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is correct, but it is "For purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon."

Mr. SHERLEY. That is just the generic term. You must permit a little camouflage even in the description of matters of this kind.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he could state approximately the condition of the manufacture of cannon to-day?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I think I could. I would rather not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman would prefer not to do so?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would prefer not to do so. In the first place, because it is difficult to trust one's memory, and, for a better reason, that I do not think it is desirable to go into the detail of it. I will say this to the gentleman, however, which I think will perhaps answer his question. I do not believe that there will need to be any slowing up of the activities of the war by virtue of an inability to get heavy field artillery. Now, I presume that is what the gentleman wanted to know?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes, incidentally; but it occurred to me, having appropriated $2,100,000,000, the House ought to have some information, if the gentleman would think proper, as to the state of the development—how many guns are in process of manufacture and when it is expected that they will be delivered.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have within reach a detailed statement not only of that but of nearly every other activity. I do not feel warranted publicly in stating that. I will be glad to give the gentleman such information for his own use as I may have.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. MADDEN. Members of the House ought to be able in some way to get the information.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that is true, and I think most of the gentlemen can get the information who undertake to get it for their own use. But I am not willing to take the responsibility on this floor of making public details of that kind.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not asking the gentleman to do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know he is not. But I would be glad to give the gentleman personally any information I can at any time.

Mr. MADDEN. I will be delighted to have it. While I want to do everything I can to promote the success of the war, at the same time I want to have some intelligent conception of why I am doing it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I will answer the gentleman as to that phase of it now. He is not being asked to spend any money in connection with field artillery proper, and therefore a knowledge of that schedule is not necessary for a determination of his duty on this bill.

I thank the gentlemen of the committee for their generous consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the subcommittee that framed this bill, but in the absence of some of the other members I did sit more or less with the committee, and the chairman very courteously consulted me about some of the items. I agree with my distinguished friend who preceded me in the opinion that it is a well-digested bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in his very elaborate and thorough speech voiced my sentiments, and I am in full accord with him. Although its size shocked us, or would have shocked us six months ago, yet we are getting accustomed to it, and it is a bill which I think we must all unite in supporting and passing.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Speaking of the size of the bill, I read an interesting statement this morning concerning the cost of various wars. This bill is almost identically the amount of the cost of the war between Great Britain and South Africa, which lasted for two years.

Mr. GILLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I take advantage of the liberty of general debate for a few minutes to call attention to an incident which happened last week on one of the very few days when I was not present. It was an extension of remarks by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. I am sorry to see that he is not present at this time, but I notified him this afternoon that I should make some comments upon it, and he has had every opportunity to be here.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks, and under that unanimous consent he published what I presume some of you have read, an editorial which was a glorification of the Democratic Party and denunciation of the Republican Party. The whole tenor and purpose of the editorial was to convey the impression that the recent investigations and disclosures and the criticisms of the War Department were a part of a Republican campaign preparatory to the next election.

Now I think that was a most unfair and improper use of the privileges of extension, because I think you gentlemen on that side will admit that during the whole of the last session, and during this session, we on this side of the House have studiously abstained from any action or from any debate which could be construed as criticism of the administration. I know for myself that has been the rule of action, and, as far as I know, on this side of the House it has also been the invariable rule of action.

I do not think that the gentleman from Oklahoma, or any other gentleman on that side of the House, would have spoken the words which are here inserted in the RECORD in that editorial; they would have been ashamed to. There is nothing at all improper in it as an editorial. It is one of that kind of partisan outbursts which all party organs indulge in at election time and which undoubtedly most of us in elections and on the stump indulge in—abuse of the other party and glorifying our own party, although perhaps this distorts the truth more than usual. But at this time and under these circumstances I think it was very unfair for the gentleman from Oklahoma to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. And it is particularly unfair in view of the fact that it gives it the franking privilege.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, yes, I presume the reason the gentleman put it in the RECORD was that probably out in the wilds of Oklahoma there was some disturbance and worry about the criticisms of the administration which were being made, and the gentleman thought that by having something which he could frank and which would stir up partisan bitterness amongst his political supporters there he would divert their attention from the real facts and make them think this was a Republican political scheme. Whereas I am sure you gentlemen know that in this House nothing has happened upon which to base such a charge.

Mr. SLOAN. In the request for leave to extend, does the gentleman advise the House of the nature of the proposed extension?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I think the gentleman's manner of securing his leave to print was as objectionable as what he printed.

A few days before he obtained his leave he rose in the House and made this request:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?
Mr. FERRIS. I want to print a short editorial on the war, peace, and against war.

Mr. Chairman, that "short" editorial, as he describes it, occupies over two of the wide columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in small print! He calls that a short editorial, and I venture to say that 90 per cent of the editorials which are published in the country are far shorter than that. He obviously wished to minimize it. Then he speaks of its subject as "Peace and against war.' I do not like to use the language which naturally comes to my mind in describing that statement, but I shall leave it to the House to read that editorial and see whether "Peace and against war" fairly describes it any more than the expression "short" describes the length of the editorial.

Mr. ROBBINS. On what day was that printed?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Monday, February 4, and is on page 1793.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if this editorial which appears in the RECORD appears as a result of that request?

Mr. GILLETT. No; he did not print it then, because the gentleman objected; but a few days after that, at the end of the session, when as you know very few Members are here, after there had been a debate in which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] had taken part, at the end of the session the gentleman from Oklahoma again rose and again requested to extend his remarks in the RECORD. This was on a different day, a few days later. Of course, the membership of the House presumes, as we know is always presumed, that when a man who has just made remarks rises and asks permission to extend that it is for the purpose of extending those particular remarks, and I have no doubt that when the gentleman rose and asked to extend his remarks in the RECORD everybody assumed that, and it may possibly have occurred to the gentleman himself that they would assume that. Nobody then objected, and the gentleman then printed this "short" editorial on "Peace and against war." As I say, I think the manner in which the gentleman inserted the matter in the RECORD is as objectionable as the matter itself.

Generally Members of the House trust each other, and as a rule the Members of the House do not take advantage of each other, but we all know that there are occasionally men who have to be watched. I never supposed the gentleman from Oklahoma, for whom I always have had great regard and respect, was in that class, and I am sorry and disappointed to find both what he has done and the manner in which he did it.

The minority has carefully ascertained from such partisan debate as is illustrated by this editorial, and we have in a measure departed from what is ordinarily the province of a minority. The normal province of a minority is to criticize. It is always good for the Government that there should be an alert, active minority, ready to criticize and watch what is being done by the majority. It conduces to good administration. But under the extraordinary circumstances of this session the minority was faced by two alternatives. Should we follow the ordinary course of a minority, should we criticize and oppose the majority and the administration, or under the very peculiar circumstances which now exist, appreciating that the prosecution of this war was the one thing that both majority and minority were bent upon, should we ignore the ordinary practice of the minority, although we did see frequent acts of the administration which we did not approve—should we openly criticize them or remain silent? I have thought it my duty under the present circumstances to depart from and abandon the ordinary conduct of a minority, and instead of criticizing lend my best efforts to the support and assistance not only to the majority of this House but to the administration, to hold up its hands, and to increase its strength and popularity as far as I could.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In substantiation of the gentleman's argument, may I call his attention to the fact that on the conscription measure, which was more necessary than any other in the proper prosecution of this war, the draft law, the support the President received on this side of the House as compared with the support he received on the Democratic side was in the ratio of 3 to 1.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have avoided even pointing out such facts as that here. I do not wish to raise any question of partisanship, and I have not. I think on the Democratic side of the House, as well as on ours, there has been no attempt to criticize us or excite our partisanship. We all know that these investigations which have been made, the investigations of the War Department and the disclosures and the criticism which followed, were not made by a partisan Republican committee, but were made by Democratic committees. The disclosures were brought forward by Democratic committees, and the criticisms have been made more by Democratic Members of Congress than by Republican Members of Congress. Therefore for the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] to inject into this House a charge of that kind is I think entirely uncalled for and is worthy of criticism. Of course the results of these investigations are still pending. Just what a Member of the minority ought to do under the circumstances doubtless we have all of us found difficult to decide. I get letters from my constituents, as I presume you all do, of two different tenors. Some letters are complaining of existing conditions, are complaining of the great powers of the administration and its abuses, and are demanding criticisms and change. On the other hand, I have some letters urging me to continue to support the administration, and I had one yesterday which went so far as to ask me to support the administration and to support every recommendation, general and specific, which the President should make.

If we are to do that, we might just as well resign. That, of course, means that we are never to express our own opinions but we are always to express the opinions which come to us from the White House. I do not suppose any Member on either side of the Chamber would pretend that was a proper attitude for us to take. Now, for myself, I have the greatest admiration for the occupant of the White House. I think in one respect his conduct has been absolutely above all criticism, and our Nation is to be congratulated that he is there and that he is our spokesman in the state papers which he has issued. [Applause.] It seems to me that as the man who is voicing the opinion of the United States, the man who is the spokesman for the whole people and who is placing our case before the world, he has been as nigh perfect as could be hoped from humanity. [Applause.] In that I yield him honor and praise and unstinted admiration. In the past his wonderful facility in epigrams has sometimes led him to make those which were unfortunate, but since this war began he has been a superb spokesman for the whole American people. But although we admire him in that capacity, I do not suppose it follows that we, as Members of a coordinate branch of the Republic, are bound to think that he is perfect in every other act that he performs. I do not believe it necessarily follows that his selection of agents, his judgment of men, is perfect. I do not believe it follows that his administrative ability is perfect or that his judgment of organization is always beyond criticism. And it seems to me in those matters we must follow our own judgment and perform the duty which has been imposed upon us by our constituents. Now, these investigations which have been made—not by Republicans, but which have been made by Democratic committees—these investigations have borne fruit. Until they were made there was no suggestion in the War Department, for instance, that there should be any changes at all; but, following these investigations, changes of organization have already been inaugurated in the War Department, and whether they may effect good, I am very sure they can not do harm and make it any worse. Of course no mere organization of itself would insure good results. Any personnel can spoil any organization. You must have an efficient man for chief responsibility in order to make any organization effective. But at the same time a good organization with the same personnel will achieve vastly better results than a poor organization. And these investigations have apparently produced changes of organization which I believe will be for the better, and indeed the President apparently up to the time of these investigations did not believe that any reorganization of the department was necessary, although such reorganization was urged and agitated in Congress.

These disclosures were made upon the very heels of these investigations, and now the President comes to Congress and asks it for absolute power to make a reorganization of his department. He does not say to Congress, "You were intrusted by the Constitution with the power of organization of departments, and I would be glad to have you reorganize them." He does not even suggest to Congress what reorganization he would like, what reorganization Congress under its constitutional powers should effect; he simply asks us to abandon all our constitutional rights and to pass them over to the President and allow him to make any reorganization he desires. That may be the wisest plan, but I think any Congress would be somewhat slow in adopting such a plan as that. Now, there is another instance where it seems to me——

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman recalls that we gave a former President power in a similar way to reorganize the customs service as being about the only practical way by which that service could be reorganized. We permitted the President to reorganize and redistrict the country for customs purposes and abolish quite a number of customs offices.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. That is upon the theory that if we by legislative act should try to abolish any customs office we would get into a great many difficulties that could not be solved in a legislative way. Does not the same principle apply to reorganizations of other departments—that it could be better carried out on a general comprehensive plan than by piecemeal work by Congress?

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think the best way to reorganize the departments is to give the President the power to reorganize as he pleases.

Mr. BORLAND. I certainly do.

Mr. GILLETT. Well, that is where——

Mr. BORLAND. There exists overlapping authority, and the President, as head of the executive department of the Government, can curtail a great deal of that overlapping authority and produce a great deal better results than——

Mr. GILLETT. He can under the present law.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not so sure.

Mr. GILLETT. That is where the gentleman is mistaken, because, if he will look at the law, he will see that under the recommendation of the Bureau of Efficiency—if that is the right title—the President can already make very extensive reorganizations. And, if the gentleman will recall, the reason we intrusted the reorganization of the customs service to the President was not because the Executive was especially qualified to do it, but because of the fact that it affected interests in this House; because that was a matter which spread all over the country, and combinations were made in the House to prevent such reorganization.

Mr. BORLAND. Did not we realize that it was practically impossible to abolish a single customhouse by action of this House?

Mr. GILLETT. Not a single customhouse, but many.

Mr. BORLAND. And therefore it was necessary to have the President deal with the entire proposition.

Mr. GILLETT. But that has no application, for instance, to such a thing as a department of munitions—no application at all.

Now, another matter which has been suggested to the House by the President, on which it seems to me Members of Congress ought at least to hesitate before following such a suggestion as my correspondent made, is the recent bill which was introduced by the leader of the majority and referred to the Ways and Means Committee, in which one man, the Secretary of the Treasury, is given power over a fund of $500,000,000, with authority to issue notes for $4,000,000,000, by which he shall practically finance this war, and which gives him power to practically close any large industry in the country.

Now, that may be wise; but what impressed me in that bill, I wondered at the assurance of the administration in asking that the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to the approval of the President, should have the power to appoint a board of directors, not to be confirmed by the Senate, but to be appointed by himself, the salary to be fixed by himself up to an amount not exceeding $12,000, and then this board appointed by himself and with the salary fixed by himself could at any time be dismissed by him. He appoints them, he has the power of dismissal, and he has the power of fixing their salary. And yet that great organization, which would be but a puppet of the Secretary of the Treasury, will have the whole business of the country in its grasp. When an administration comes before Congress and asks such authority it seems to me that Members of Congress on both sides of the House might well consider carefully the merits of the question and whether or not authority of that kind should be granted.

Mr. ROBBINS. Who prepared such a bill as that?

Mr. GILLETT. It is prepared by the administration. I can not tell who, but it is sponsored before the committee by the Secretary of the Treasury, its chief beneficiary. All I know is that it is presented as an administration bill, giving the Secretary of the Treasury, who I do not think has the entire confidence of the business world, these unheard of powers.

Now, we on this side have not been backward in giving the President authority. We ought not to be. I recognize that in a time of war the President ought to have very large powers. We certainly have given generously to the administration since this war began powers far beyond what any President of the United States ever exercised. And I for one expect to continue to grant powers which I deem necessary—not everything, it seems to me, that an administration may ask—but I expect to continue in the future, as I have in the past, to join with that side of the House and loyally grant every dollar which we think he can wisely spend, and to give all the powers which we think are necessary for the prosecution of the war, and to suppress all partisan feeling as far as possible.

But if we granted everything the administration asked this very appropriation bill before us would be $500,000,000 bigger than it is. The Committee on Appropriations has cut out of it $500,000,000 which was asked; not because we did not wish to grant the administration everything which we thought they could possibly use, and not from any criticism of the departments in their estimates, but because errors were found—places were found where large amounts could be cut down without any injury to the Government. And therefore, as I say, by refusing to simply blindly grant the requests of the administration we have cut out of this bill $500,000,000. And last summer we cut out—I do not remember how much, but I venture to say $1,500,000,000 from the requests that were then made. I do not mean, of course, that that is all saved. Very much of it is postponed, very much of it is uncertain; but, at any rate, for the time being it makes the expenses so definite that you can compare them with the receipts and be able to calculate upon the necessary revenues.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. In these eliminations which have been made, cutting out the $500,000,000 from the estimates of the departments, the committee unanimously, without any division, recommends the elimination?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. So that the eliminations have the approval of both sides of the House?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly. There never has been since the beginning of this war any partisan division. I think always the Appropriations Committee has been less subject to partisanship than any other committee. But there never has been since the beginning of this war, to my knowledge, the slightest partisan division in the membership of that committee. I am happy to say that the majority of it treat the minority with just as much consideration as if they belonged to their own party, and I think we have tried to cooperate with them, and we have given the administration every dollar which we thought it could wisely expend.

I noticed in the paper last night, in large headlines, that the President had ordered an investigation of the Hog Island yard. Why, my friends, that shows again that Congress ought not entirely to sit here as a rubber stamp for the administration and that the action of our committees is useful, because some weeks ago in this House the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, by unanimous vote I believe, and certainly by no partisan vote, went to the Committee on Rules and asked them to give a rule for the investigation of conditions at Hog Island.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I know the gentleman desires to be accurate.

Mr. GILLETT. I certainly do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The request as it came to the Committee on Rules was not a request for the investigation. It was a request that the Committee on Rules consider a resolution. Subsequently the author of the resolution came before the Committee on Rules and withdrew the request.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes. And I can tell the gentleman, and he probably knows, why he withdrew it. I see no difference in the gentleman's statement and mine, for the gentleman, I am sure, will admit the purpose was for a rule allowing the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to investigate. The reason why that request was withdrawn was that a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries had a consultation with the chairman of the Shipping Board and told him the facts which that committee wished to investigate and the scandals which they thought existed, and the chairman of the Shipping Board asked that he be allowed to make the investigation himself first. And on that assurance the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries did not press their request. But they took the initiative. They had made the request and the chairman of the Shipping Board undertook to make an investigation, and therefore they withdrew their request for an investigation. That was several weeks ago, I think, and now last night the paper said, as if it was a new thing, "The President has ordered an investigation of the Hog Island scandal."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit, that I do not know anything about the conference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] and the head of the Shipping Board, Mr. Hurley; but Mr. Hurley appeared before the Committee on Rules and stated that he could see no objection whatever to the investigation; that the investigation which had been carried on by the Senate had been very helpful to the board and he did not oppose in any way action by the Committee on Rules. Nor did the Committee on Rules at any time oppose any investigation. There never was any feeling about the matter.

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly. I did not mean to intimate that there was. It was amicably agreed that the chairman of the Shipping Board should make an investigation. I simply use this as an illustration here. So there was something useful that the action of a committee of Congress effected, and that is the attitude which I have assumed on these investigations.

The comments on these investigations are what I object to in that article. These investigations that have caused so much disturbance throughout the country did not originate in partisan feeling. They originated in Democratic committees. Of course, it is always a question to be considered in a war whether you are going to do more good by making an investigation and bringing out disclosures and thereby disquieting the people than by not making the investigation; whether you will do more good and at the same time obtain better results, and whether the obtaining of better results is going to be more important than to excite distress and disquiet among the people. I have felt that it was not for us in the minority to take that responsibility. But I do believe myself that the result of these investigations, judging from the changes that apparently are contemplated by the administration in the War Department, has been helpful.

But I have wandered far afield from what I intended, and that brings me back to my text, this insertion in the RECORD by a gentleman on that side of the House of charges that I do not believe any man on that side of the House would have wanted to stand up in his seat and make himself, and I think it is unworthy of the gentleman and unwise and objectionable, and I hope it will not be repeated. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he did not happen to be in the Chair when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was through, but he is informed that the gentleman from Illinois yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts such time as he might desire.

Mr. GILLETT. He did.

The CHAIRMAN. That was 20 minutes. The Chair permitted the gentleman from Massachusetts to run over that time.

Mr. GILLETT. When the Chair said my time had expired I asked to be recognized in my own right, and I thought that after that I was talking in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to yield some of his time?

Mr. GILLETT. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, how is the time divided in this debate? Is there any limit on it?

The CHAIRMAN. No; only the general rule.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] consumed two hours and a quarter. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to say that he hoped to read the bill to-night.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think we can read the bill for an hour to-night.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. That is 45 minutes. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, on a previous occasion, when we were considering an appropriation bill, I stated, speaking for myself, but I think expressing the views of the members of the committee, that I could not say even in regard to a bill relative to the details of which I might be much more familiar than I am with this bill, that all of the sums proposed to be appropriated were necessary or essential.

The duty of the committee is to scrutinize with care the estimates submitted, and in time of peace the duty of the committee is to guard with very jealous care the Federal Treasury, and to resolve any doubts that they may have in their minds in favor of the Treasury rather than in favor of the estimates. But in time of war the committee is compelled to adopt a different attitude toward estimates. Its first duty is to see that no sums asked for and necessary, or likely to be necessary, for the prosecution of the war are withheld, and in case of doubt it is the duty of the committee to resolve the doubt in favor of the Government, in favor of the estimates and the opinions of the men who present them.

That is what the committee has done in this bill, as in the case of all other bills that have come before the committee since the war began. It is true there has been a reduction in many of the estimates, more apparent than real in some cases, all of which illustrates how much more careful and thorough and painstaking committees of Congress sometimes are than the gentlemen who prepare estimates, because I believe that the men who appeared before the committee in support of the estimates will admit that after the matter had all been thrashed out and the committee had reached a decision the committee had made a better guess as to the amounts they would be likely to need, even from the standpoint of abundance, than they themselves had made in the original estimates.

Not a necessary dollar has been withheld. Of that I am assured by the gentlemen on the subcommittee who are much more familiar with the items than I can be, and I feel confident of that from what knowledge I have personally of the items in the bill.

The Republican Party, whatever else may be said about it, whatever sins of omission or commission it may have been guilty of as an organization, has beyond all question and controversy been ever and always a party of patriotism. [Applause.] There has never been any question about that in the mind of any honest, unbiased, and unprejudiced well-informed person. The Republican Party during this war is simply marching true to form [applause]; simply pursuing its historic policy; simply maintaining its unvarying and unvaried attitude of patriotism and support of the Government and administration. [Applause.]

Now, the gentlemen on the other side are doing likewise. But it makes a good deal of difference, when you come to all of these matters of legislation and appropriation, whether those who are suggesting and asking for and are to administer and use them are of your own political household of faith or whether they are of another political household. No matter how good a patriot a man may be, if he is a good citizen and worth his salt he is also a partisan, using the term in its proper and best sense, and there is always an inclination to follow your own administration wherever it may lead and whither it may wander, no matter how far afield. There is likewise always a temptation to criticize the opposition, and it is a temptation that within proper lines and limitations should be yielded to, so far as opposition and criticism may be helpful and useful in the establishment of proper policies in the wise development of administrative measures and the economical expenditure of the public money.

As the Republican Party began, so it will continue, so far as this war is concerned and all other wars in which we may ever be involved. It may make other mistakes in other times, but if it remains true to the principles on which it was founded, and which have ever actuated the overwhelming majority of its membership, it will always be found supporting the Government, holding up the arm of those in authority, maintaining the dignity of the Nation, and standing for the honor of the flag. These are somewhat trying times for a patriot, particularly one not of the administration party, but also, I may say in passing, at times for those of the administration party; for revolution succeeds revolution, either in proposal or performance, more rapidly under this flag and in these days than anywhere under popular government. Starting out at the beginning of the war with a Constitution that limited and restricted the powers and prerogatives of Congress, we have been compelled to take a view of the great palladium of our liberties that justified us in granting extraordinary powers to those in control. No sooner do we make one extraordinary grant of power, which seems the very apex and pinnacle, than we are asked to grant other powers that loom so mountain high that the first enactment is as a molehill in comparison. We are asked now, or will be shortly, not only to grant autocratic powers to the President beyond those legally held by any prince or potentate under the sun—we have already done that—but we will be asked to grant powers to reorganize the governmental structure in a way that would leave the President the most unlimited autocrat that the world has seen in many a long day. It may be that a part of these things ought to be done. I am not at this time expressing an opinion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman desire that last statement to stand fully—to reorganize the entire structure of the Government?

Mr. MONDELL. The administrative structure, perhaps I should have said.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Executive.

Mr. MONDELL. Not the judicial structure.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Nor the legislative.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the legislative structure seems for the time being—and I am not saying that in a criticizing way—to exist only for the purpose of placing autocratic power in the Executive. There is no necessity for changing the legislative structure, so long as the legislative machinery works along the lines of the Executive will in all of these propositions intended to promote executive and administrative power. I thank the gentleman for correcting me, or giving me an opportunity to make a little more clear what I had in mind. And I will say to the gentleman that I am not making any promises or predictions on my own behalf as to what my attitude with regard to those propositions should be. I am simply referring to their very extraordinary character, a character that a short time ago would have shocked us all, but we are getting gradually accustomed to proposals that in other times would have been calculated, as we then viewed the matter, to make the Goddess of Liberty up yonder on the Dome of the Capitol totter on her lofty pedestal. I hope the lady is herself becoming accustomed to these changes, even as we are, because I would not want to have the Dome endangered, or that splendid emblem of liberty unsteady on its foundations.

Mr. SHERLEY. She is used to exalted attitudes.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will permit, is it not a fact that the Republican Party always having stood for and believed in a strong, centralized government, the members of that party received a less shock from some of these proposed reforms than our Democratic brethren, who have always taken the opposite view?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman is right about that to a certain extent, though we have not stood for an autocratic Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman's remark, being translated, mean that he is willing to do that in time of peace, when there is no excuse for it?

Mr. MONDELL. That is not so much a matter of party as it is of personal temperament. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], without intending to do it, has cast something of a reflection on these revolutionary performances. Having so far considered, and, finally, with some reluctance, approved and embraced them as necessary in war, I would not venture now to criticize them.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Are the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from Iowa, and myself correct in drawing this conclusion from the profound and philosophic discussion of the gentleman from Wyoming, that there is any general or comprehensive surrender of the Executive jurisdiction of this country?

Mr. MONDELL. I have heard some suggestions that were a little startling, but I think that is the most startling of them all. Has there been any surrender of Executive jurisdiction? Well, not that anybody has heard of.

Mr. MADDEN. Was that a question or a comment?

Mr. MONDELL. A question in the form of a comment, and the questioner knew the answer. Certainly there has been no surrender of Executive jurisdiction, and more power is asked for, and, within certain limits, perhaps it should be granted.

Mr. TOWNER. The inquiry was suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] as to whether or not the bill to which the gentleman refers was any interference with the powers of the legislative department. I want to call attention, just by way of illustration——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. TOWNER. Did I misunderstand the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not say anything about the bill. I referred to the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. TOWNER. I accept the amendment. Just by way of illustration I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the bill which we have under consideration makes an appropriation for transportation of the Army of $125,000,000. Is it not true that if the powers are granted to the President which he desires, he might transfer that appropriation of $125,000,000 from the transportation of troops to, for instance, the Indian Service or any other service that he desired?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. TOWNER. And that would be an entire abrogration to the Executive of appropriations which are specific?

Mr. MONDELL. Assuming that the new organization, or reorganization, or consolidation sought would involve, as I think it logically would, lump-sum appropriations, that is entirely true. In other words, we could not well appropriate for several branches of the public service under certain heads, and under certain jurisdictions and control, if we had a provision of law whereby all present organizations might be wiped out and those distinctions cease.

Mr. TOWNER. But I will say to the gentleman that that is not left only to inference, because, as I understand the bill, and as it has been published and proposed, it allows the President to transfer these funds by an Executive order, if he so desires.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Only for the purposes for which they are appropriated, I think.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, while it is true that we, as a party, and gentlemen on both sides, have given the Government all the funds and all the authority and all the man power necessary for the conduct of the war, and shall continue to do so, it is also true that within certain lines, intended to be helpful and constructive, we can not, even while the war is in progress, entirely absolve ourselves from the duty of reasonable criticism. That should be limited to those things which will, as the gentleman from Illinois so well stated a moment ago, be helpful and useful in bringing about reforms.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman if another bill recently introduced in Congress, to form a war corporation with $500,000,000 capital, to be administered by one man, has had the benefit of the gentleman's perusal?

Mr. MONDELL. I must say that I am reserving the shock which I expect to receive when I carefully peruse that bill to a later day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman, in referring to the bill introduced into another body as being a very great grant of power and authority, will find when he examines this bill more carefully that it confers, on another gentleman it is true, but a member of the family, a far greater power than that which shocked his judgment.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is probably true, because when in a great industrial country you give control over practically all the industries of the country, you not only grant a most extraordinary power, affecting every individual in the country in his business and in his opportunity to gain a livelihood, but, in addition to that, you place in the hands of the officer who is granted that power, a political power so great that it is altogether possible that it might be so used as to perpetuate a man or party indefinitely. I think that is one of the things that should be very carefully considered, because I hope gentlemen on the Democratic side are no more disposed than gentlemen on the Republican side to create conditions in this country under which men will be greatly tempted to use extraordinary power and authority for the purpose of perpetuating their control. I hope we are all of us willing to take our political chances, and we all realize that it is better for our country that no party shall be so fortified and intrenched that the siege guns and the mortars of an outraged citizenship can not dislodge it from its trench lines and its citadel. [Applause.]

But I am not going to criticize unless I think it will be helpful to better conditions. It requires considerable restraint to withhold criticism when in times like these there is so much that is subject to criticism, but I propose to do it as far as possible and never indulge in criticism except as I hope it may be helpful.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield before he goes to another topic?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What does the gentleman think of the practice of a government—I am not speaking of this Government now—in trying to build up public opinion through organs created and managed by itself, as the German Government has done by its control of the press and its publication of articles which originate entirely with the Government, and of course which finds everything the Government does highly satisfactory and worthy of the highest merit?

Mr. MONDELL. I think there will be no disagreement on the proposition that there is very great danger in a press official or otherwise controlled politically by a government by an administration. There is an appropriation bill which we passed regularly through this House that for years has carried legislation which I had some part in framing intending to restrain and control the effort to build up public sentiment favorable to a certain kind of administration. That was in time of peace. We are in war now, and, while I personally think we may be overdoing the matter of official publicity, I think some of it has been helpful and useful in certain lines, and I am not disposed to criticize it, although I do feel that it has gone far afield. Of course, when I say this I do not intend to include the three publicity agents at Hog Island, one drawing a salary of $10,000, one at $7,500, and one $6,000 a year, whose duty it was to camouflage the situation and cover with an ambuscade of rhetoric and misinformation the patriotic gentlemen who were drawing seven salaries in the alleged behalf of the launching of a merchant marine.

Mr. SLOAN. If the gentleman will yield, I am somewhat concerned about the question submitted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], and I would like to know if he can give the relevancy of that question. I did not understand that there were any publications of that kind in America, and if there are not why take up European government practices as if there were such here in America?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, whatever the facts are let us, for the sake of the argument, assume there are not. [Laughter.]

But there are some things that ought to come out, there are some things that have come out, in regard to some of our cantonments, and shipbuilding, and all that sort of thing, and it is proper they should come out, and they have come out largely through the efforts of Democrats. They have come out in a way I hope may be helpful. You can not properly charge the man at the head of affairs with responsibility for these things. Some of them are perhaps inevitable in times of enormous expansion. The thing to do, when we find them, is to punish the men who are guilty in order that they shall no longer cast discredit on men in authority and bring dishonor to their Government.

There was a cloth-sorting contract made here some time ago. A certain gentleman named Eisenman, of the Council of National Defense, had something to do with it. A gentleman named Pereless, who, it seems, is an organization expert from New York, was invited down here and put in charge of a bureau or division for the reclamation of waste materials. He was given a captain's commission. In due course of time it became his duty to examine into this sorting contract, this contract under which certain gentlemen were to take old uniforms, I believe, and make them over or utilize them as best they could. I know little about the contract. In the course of his service Capt. Pereless made an investigation into this contract. He was called to testify in regard to it before a Senate committee. It is claimed by those who pretend to know that the Government has saved a great deal of money, several millions, by reason of the contract having been annulled or modified. Capt. Pereless was a captain, but he is a captain no longer. He was honorably discharged, it is true, as a man who had so well served his Government should be, but the captain did not want to be separated from the public service. He desired to serve.

He had asked to be put on the inactive list in order that he might secure service somewhere else under the Government, because I assume his service in the particular bureau to which he had been assigned was not altogether pleasant after he had made the investigations and revelations referred to. Instead of a transfer he got a discharge. I commend that particular case to the gentlemen who are responsible under the administration and for the honest conduct of affairs. It may have been entirely proper, but it would be a very unhappy thing at this time of crisis, when we need all of the honest men and all of the careful, painstaking men, and all of the fearless investigators we can get to guard the Government against waste and looting and fraud—it would be most unfortunate in this juncture if it should become known or believed that when men do what they believe to be their duty they soon find themselves separated from the public service and returned to private life. It would be a very sad and unfortunate thing for the country if we should arrive at that condition of affairs, and I hope that some one will investigate that discharged, which is referred to on the first page of one of the morning papers of this city.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I suggest to the gentleman that he read into his speech the examination in that case?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so, if the House will give me that privilege. The portion of the article in the Washington Post of this morning relating to Capt. Pereless's examination is as follows:

SAVED UNITED STATES ABOUT $2,000,000.

On December 29 he was summoned as a witness before the Senate Military Committee, and described at length the investigation into the sorting plant, the cancellation of which saved the Government about $2,000,000. The following is the verbatim report of a portion of the testimony, taken from the official committee report:

"Senator MCKELLAR. In your dealings with Mr. Eisenman, was he much interested in this control, retaining this control, through the Base Sorting Plant?

"Capt. PERELESS. Well, he was very anxious not to have the contract annulled.

"Senator MCKELLAR. What did he say about it?

RECALLS EISENMAN'S WORDS.

"Capt. PERELESS. I only spoke to him once, when I delivered a letter to him in which the Quartermaster General advised him the contract would be annulled, and he seemed to think it would be a very great mistake and a bad thing for the Government; that the Government could not carry on that sorting themselves. He asked me who I reported to and where I got my orders, and he said he would show me where I got my orders.

"Senator MCKELLAR. That he would show you where you got your orders?

"Capt. PERELESS. Yes, sir.

"Senator MCKELLAR. In other words, he felt offended that you should have brought in any such notice.

"Capt. PERELESS. He probably did not feel I had any authority for doing it, although I had the letter signed by Gen. Sharpe.

"Senator MCKELLAR. And he threatened you for your action in the matter?"

TRANSFER REFUSED HIM.

After this, in January, Capt. Pereless presented a plan for the reorganization of the conservation division, which was not acted upon. Two other men were placed in charge of the reorganization, and Capt. Pereless, who found himself deprived of the opportunity to do the work for which, as an expert, he had been requested to come to Washington, asked to be returned to the inactive list of the Officers' Reserve Corps, with the intention of being assigned to duty in another branch of the service.

Instead, Capt. Pereless received orders giving him an honorable discharge from the Army and dismissing him from the service.

He protested against this discharge, stating that he desired active duty elsewhere. That request was denied.

Naturally the incident has aroused much interest in the Army in view of the testimony of Capt. Pereless before a committee of the United States Senate, where he was summoned to inform Senators of conditions within the department with which he has had to do.

Mr. Chairman, so much for my preface now. I want to discuss an item in the bill, and I may ask the gentleman in charge of the time for a few minutes more in which to discuss it.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to read the real story if this is but the preface.

Mr. MONDELL. A provision was inserted in the national-defense act which became a law the 17th of last August for a revolving fund of two and a half million dollars, which was to be used for the purpose of purchasing, sorting, storing, and selling seeds for cash. Under that appropriation a large amount of seed corn was secured and a considerable amount of wheat, barley, rye, some cotton, and other seed, and is being distributed and sold. The Department of Agriculture has asked for an additional sum of $6,000,000 for the same purpose. The committee has reported $4,000,000 for that purpose. At the proper time I shall ask to increase that amount to $6,000,000, the amount of the estimate, and shall seek to modify the language somewhat by providing that these seeds in addition to being sold at cost for cash may also be sold on credit not to exceed one year with approved security of local business organizations. I think there is no item in this bill more important in its way than that. Of course, when you are at war the most important items are for guns and powder and uniforms, but at the same time we must sustain the men in the field and we must sustain the populations at home, and we need to encourage agriculture. The item in question has served a useful purpose. It has enabled the department to purchase the seeds and the department is now selling them and will continue to do so. It has obligated the Government in practically the full sum—two and a half million dollars—but can use considerably more.

But so far as a considerable part of the country is concerned, this fund is not available in a satisfactory way so long as the sales must be for cash. There has been a good deal of agitation at one time or another, there always is from time to time when we have droughts, freshets, and that sort of thing, for the free distribution of Government seed. I am one of those who believe we ought to be very careful about making free distributions. They are not very likely to be equitably or wisely distributed. It is not a good thing to get the people to thinking that Uncle Sam is a liberal, not to say spendthrift, father, who can pick dollars off of bushes along the road and hand them out wherever they think they need them. The people of the country, the farmers of the country, hard up as some of them are, are not paupers. I think they want to pay for what they receive. But let me illustrate the condition in a territory some three or four hundred miles wide and stretching from the Canadian border to the Gulf, including the States from Texas north to North Dakota, parts of some eight or nine States. Over a considerable portion of most of those States we have had a condition of drought, very severe in Texas, equally so in some parts of Montana, less severe and less trying in other sections in between. In my own State of Wyoming for a number of years past we have had in several counties local organizations of bankers, merchants, and stockmen who have obligated themselves for a sufficient sum of money to furnish seeds to those who needed them and were unable to purchase and pay cash for them. These local organizations have sold these seeds at cost. They have loaned the money without interest or with a very small interest charge, and in most cases, I believe, they have been successful in securing the return of the loan, all or a very great portion of it.

But there is a condition up there now under which it is more difficult than it ever has been in the past for these local organizations to handle the situation. There are many reasons for that, which I have not the time to discuss, but that such is the fact is known to all of the people of that section. My thought is this: That if we could provide that this fund, or seeds purchased with it, might be loaned on approved security given by business organizations, we could very quickly secure those organizations and thus furnish seeds for which those organizations should become responsible. We might thus very promptly distribute among the farmers of such sections the rye, wheat, sugar-beet seed, potatoes, corn, kaffir corn, millet, and cotton, which they must have if we are to have the maximum production of that great western country. My thought is that the Secretary of Agriculture might call upon such local organizations to inform him as to the amount of money needed in their counties, for instance, assuming the county as the unit of organization for the purpose of securing seed. Local organizations in my State know what is needed, because they have been in the business in the past. The question would be asked of such local organizations, To what extent will you guarantee the Government the return of the funds—$5,000, $10,000, $15,000, or $20,000—covering the cost of seed needed in that locality by those unable to pay cash? These local organizations could very quickly place before the Secretary statements showing their financial responsibility. They would provide the agency through which the seeds could be distributed. They would be distributed wisely and well through such agencies, because the organization that distributed them would be responsible for the return of the money. I think within 30 days throughout all this section where this help is needed organizations of that kind could be provided.

Of course, where no such help is needed such an organization would not be forthcoming. Where it was needed, public sentiment and the disposition of the business people of the community to meet the needs of the community would immediately lead to the formation of such organization. In my State there are, I believe, several of them that could within a week place before the Secretary every needed evidence of their responsibility. He could furnish them the seed——

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. Or he could allow them to secure the seeds, giving them the necessary credits, and very promptly the machinery could be put in motion that would get into each section the seed that is needed. Before I yield to the gentleman, may I speak on a line of thought I have in mind? It may be said, if you are to do this in the territory you describe, why not do it everywhere. Because there is this difference in the situation: The country I have mentioned——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me 10 minutes additional?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming may continue for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. I was going to make the suggestion that the gentleman ask for time in his own right.

Mr. MONDELL. Why are we asking this kind of aid in that particular section? Because it is a new country; because we have little accumulation of capital. In the older communities of the country, although there may be farmers just as needy as they are in these sections, and no doubt there are, there are men with capital who can handle these matters, who can furnish credit, whereas we are in a position where we lack capital. We lack the capital we have had in past years which has been extending this credit.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it not a fact that the great difficulty with the American farmer to-day is lack of labor more than lack of seed?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, there is a lack of labor, and there will be a lack of labor; but I do not think we should decline to aid the farmer in securing the seed that he is willing to plant because of the fact that there may be difficulty either in the planting or the harvesting of it. No farmer, as my friend understands, will ask for seed unless he feels reasonably assured he will be able to gather the harvest. No association such as those I have suggested will guarantee repayment except in communities where they feel reasonably confident that there will be labor enough to gather the harvest. And you would be surprised how the people of a community rise to a situation like this.

The young boys, the girls, the old folks, the clerks, people in all employments give their help in time of need to gather the crops, and to a considerable extent in the planting of them and in the tending of them. I come from a country which mainly gave its quota before the draft, and so we were stripped of the stalwart young fellows early in the conflict. And yet we got along pretty well. I do not think any of our crops were lost because of the lack of labor, but it required the aid and help of everybody in the community. And the communities rose to the occasion. Of course, we brought in help from all directions and we paid perfectly fabulous prices.

Mr. ROBBINS. The trouble with Pennsylvania is this: The State Grange at a session last week passed resolutions from data obtained from members to the effect that they needed 210,000 laborers on the farms of Pennsylvania within the membership of the grange.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true, and I think that is a matter we should attend to. What I am interested in now is to get seed, because if we do not have the seed where it is needed there will be no crops. You probably do not have that difficulty, but the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER] knows the situation in his State, as I know it in mine, and that we need the seed, and our people need the aid in securing the seed, and they will be able to pay for it, and local organizations will volunteer to become responsible for the return of the funds and for the handling, administration, and distribution of the seed. All we want is a little credit.

Mr. BAER. Does not the gentleman think that this would bring more valuable results if it were loaned to the farmers on credit to enable them to get food and grain and cotton for our allies than to put it in these vast reservoirs out there where the farmers have not sufficient credit and it will not do any good? That is, if the grain is in the elevators and they have not the cash to buy, it will not do them any good.

Mr. MONDELL. Whatever benefits may follow from other assistance and other help and come from other sources, here, it seems to me, is an opportunity to loan the Federal credit in a way that will certainly bring immediate returns in increased crop production, and it can be done in a way that will guarantee the return of the moneys without loss. Under a procedure of that sort, which is very simple, the Secretary of Agriculture could let it be known that he stood ready to hear from these voluntary associations, not to exceed one in a county, business associations of men who were responsible as to the amount they were willing to guarantee in repayment on seed, and in a very short time the machinery could be set in motion and the seed furnished.

This is a tremendously important thing. I have been hearing from my people for months in this matter of seed. I have said to them that I did not believe that Congress was disposed to make a free-seed distribution; that I doubted the wisdom of that sort of thing.

But there is a way to do it, expeditious, certain, comparatively simple, and I am sure in a great many communities in the State which my friend represents there are volunteer associations of business men and stockmen who would be willing to take this matter up.

Mr. BAER. Does the gentleman's constituents ask for free seed? It is my understanding that my constituents would not take free seed if they could get them. They do not want to be an object of charity. They want to borrow the money to get seed.

Mr. MONDELL. Coming to think of it, I think those people who have suggested free seed come from just over the line; I do not have in mind anybody from Wyoming who has made that suggestion. [Laughter.] But they want an opportunity to plant their fields. They have gone through trying times of drought, and the country is new, and capital is exceedingly limited, and the banks are small.

Mr. COX. How about the labor supply?

Mr. MONDELL. I discussed that with my friend from Pennsylvania awhile ago. If the farmer does not feel that he has labor to plant the fields, he will not want to buy seed, and if a local association that is responsible for the repayment does not believe that the farmer can plant, cultivate, and harvest, it will not help him get the seed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. I want to speak about 15 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. We have had 4 hours and 20 minutes of debate, exactly divided between the two sides. That is very liberal debate. I hope the gentleman will not prolong the general debate at this time.

Mr. DILLON. I would like to have only 15 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman does that, other gentlemen will want time. I do not want to be discourteous to gentlemen, but I am anxious to make progress on the bill.

Mr. DILLON. I have been in attendance for the last four weeks, and I was unable to get a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture. I ask for 15 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. This morning, before any time for debate was fixed, the gentleman from South Dakota had asked for 15 minutes, and he was assured he would get it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Very well. In view of that fact I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to address the committee for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, it is constantly asserted that the live-stock market is controlled by the packers. Do these profiteers fix the price the producer is to receive and the price the consumer is to pay? It would seem so.

The cattleman ships his cattle to the stockyards. Wherever the stockyards are located the packing houses have their plants. The buyers of live stock each morning fix the price to be paid for live stock. There is but one price, one lone bidder, and the owner must accept the price offered. Otherwise, he must ship back home, and his losses are beyond repair.

If he ships to another market he finds the same packers, the same profiteers, ready for the big bargains that are to fall into the combination net. They divide among themselves, on the basis of percentage, the live stock coming into the market. They likewise divide the territory and each packer has the exclusive right to sell in his territory. They fix the price for the farmer's stock and likewise the price that the consumer of finished products must pay. Thus they control both ends of the market.

In order to perfect their control they own the market places, stockyards, refrigerator cars, and cold-storage plants. They have driven out of business the small operators who formerly operated slaughterhouses. The local dealer in order to insure a steady supply must now buy from the big packing establishments.

By their combination they control the meat supply from the stockyards to the consumer. No independent operator can break through the operations of these profiteers, who are entrenched behind the market places, the packing plants, the cold-storage plants, and the ownership of the refrigerator cars. They control every artery of trade in these products. In addition to the meat products, they control, in the same manner, all the by-products of the industry, such as lard, hides, fertilizer, and so forth.

The packers, the produce speculators, and the jobbers are in absolute control of all of the instrumentalities of the market. There are 75 cold-storage plants in New York City and 48 in Chicago. In these two large cities are found a combination of food profiteers fixing the selling price of the product in the hands of the producer and likewise fixing the price that the consumer must pay.

The Butter and Egg Board of Chicago fixes the daily price for eggs, butter, and poultry. They gamble in future delivery just the same as is done in the grain products. When these articles are plentiful they fix the price the producer is to receive, and then they buy all the available supply providing for future delivery. Through these gambling devices the price may be forced up or beaten down at the will of the profiteer.

The sale of fictitious eggs is constantly going on in these markets. The honest sale of eggs has almost become a mere incident of the business in these markets. Recent investigation in Chicago disclosed the appalling fact that 4,000 carloads of eggs that had never had any existence were bought and sold on the Chicago Board of Trade.

Every time fictitious eggs are sold the sale is registered and aids in the fixing of prices for the real commodity. On every sale of these fictitious eggs the price is forced up one-half cent to 1 cent per dozen. It is said by one writer that these profiteers on the easter egg trade alone took $6,000,000 of excess profits.

Herbert Hoover, before the Senate Committee on Agriculture on June 19, 1917, made the following statement:

> Thousands of men in this country who never owned a commodity in their life have bought canned goods, flour, wheat, and every food commodity to speculate for the rise.

He further stated:

> Practically the entire wheat supply to Belgium is to-day imported from the United States, and, despite the extraordinary costs of transportation, the price of bread is 60 per cent of the price in New York City. A large portion of the wheat in France comes from this country, and yet the price of bread is, again, 40 per cent below our own. In England, where food control was started too late, the price is 30 per cent below our price, and in Canada, again, we see a lower range of prices to the consumer than in our own country, although the producer realizes the same price.

John J. Dillon, former commissioner of foods of New York State, says the food exchanges are "gambling dens."

It is said that New York City food profiteers one week in November, 1916, on the item of eggs alone, took a toll of $1,000,000. These eggs were purchased at about 17 cents per dozen and sold at 60 to 70 cents per dozen, after having been held for months. Investigation shows that it costs 2 cents per dozen to hold eggs for 10 months.

It is estimated that the people of New York City would save $10,000,000 on eggs, $7,000,000 on live poultry, and $10,000,000 on dressed poultry annually by establishing municipal cold-storage plants. Apples are sold in the fall of the year for three to five dollars per barrel. The consumer later pays twelve to fifteen dollars for the same apples.

The earnings of Armour & Co. in 1914 were $7,509,000, while in 1916 they were $20,100,000. Swift & Co. earned in 1914, $9,450,000, in 1916 they earned $20,465,000. In 1914 the United Fruit Co. earned $2,264,000 and in 1916 they earned $11,943,000. This is what the profiteers are doing to the producer and the consumer.

During the canning season, when the price is at the lowest point, the jobbers buy all the product of the plants engaged in canning fruits and vegetables. After the season is over they fix their own price by gentlemen's agreements and the consumer is forced to pay the price the combination fixes. There is no real competition in the jobbing trade on food products.

On account of market conditions vegetables and fruits frequently sell on the market at high prices while the supply is so great that it is rotting on the farms. The food speculators would rather destroy produce than lower the price to the consumer. Our system of distribution has broken down. From all parts of the country comes a demand for some new method of distribution to take the place of the inefficient, worn-out method now in use.

The middlemen have taken possession of the market places and converted them into veritable gambling dens. Nothing except the lash of public opinion will drive them from these public places. The producer must carry his products closer to the consumer, and the consumer must get in closer touch with the producer. Cooperative buying agencies and cooperative selling agencies is one solution of this difficult problem. Through these agencies the profiteer can be eliminated.

It is doubtful if any one can defend the present market system. It is doubtful if a system of markets can be successfully regulated by law. Cooperative methods, if they can be properly financed, ought to remedy the evils existing in our market system. If success can not be acquired along cooperative lines the people will ultimately demand Government control and ownership of cold-storage plants, terminal markets, and public warehouses, operated either by State or National Government. When so operated the gambling dens, the combination of profiteers, and speculators in food products will be eliminated in favor of the producer and consumer. Give the farmer an honest market and he will produce the food. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest to the gentleman from South Dakota that if some of these profiteers who are robbing the people were put in the penitentiary, where they belong, it might help the situation also.

Mr. DILLON. I think it would. I think it ought to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

For expenses of experimental work and investigations undertaken by the Council of National Defense, by the advisory commission, or subordinate bodies; for the employment of a director, secretary, chief clerk, expert, clerical, and other assistance, equipment and supplies, including law books, books of reference, newspapers, and periodicals; subsistence and travel, including the expenses of members of the advisory commission or subordinate bodies going to and attending meetings of the advisory commission or subordinate bodies; rent of offices and grounds; repairs and upkeep of buildings occupied by the council; and printing and binding done at the Government Printing Office, $250,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I was unfortunate not to hear the very able speech of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], so that I do not know just to what extent he went into some of these various items, but I desire to ask him with reference to this particular appropriation, and to inquire just what experimental work is being conducted, and whether it comprehends activities by some of the various subcommittees or advisory bodies relating to war problems or tests made of materials used by the War Department?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman means tests by the Council of National Defense?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; under this item.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not recall that there was any testimony touching the activities of the council in the way of experimental work. There is being done quite a bit of experimental work of a very valuable character by the Bureau of Standards, and some of that may have come about through direction of the council, but I think it more likely to have come as the direct result of the War Department's suggestions or requests.

Mr. WALSH. Would that come out of that appropriation?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. The language that has struck the gentleman is simply the language that was used in the first instance touching the Council of National Defense, and this $250,000 is largely for the pay of employees and clerks of the various committees under the Council of National Defense. The gentleman will find in the hearings a very interesting account by Mr. Gifford, the director of the Council of National Defense, touching its existing organization and touching the elimination of committees—the subsidiary committees that grew up under the advisory commission. The gentleman will recall that it is both a council and an advisory commission.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. There has been some criticism in the past of the advisory committees because they were composed of men largely representing industries with which they were supposed to deal. Most of these committees have now distributed their duties and the organizations which speak for these industries have no governmental connection. Those former committees have largely been eliminated. The gentleman will find an interesting statement along that line.

Mr. WALSH. This general reorganization that has been effected, I suppose, is set forth in the hearings?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is an attempt by question and answer to give a clear view of the existing relationship of the council and the subsidiary committees to the organization. It is set out in some detail. The statement by Mr. Gifford is a very creditable one. He made a very enlightening statement.

Mr. WALSH. I understand he is still the director?

Mr. SHERLEY. He is still the director.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question right there. What limit is there on the item of subsistence in this paragraph? Is there any limitation by law as to how much could be allowed per day from this amount?

Mr. SHERLEY. Four dollars' per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence or $5 of actual expense. That is the law.

Mr. BLACK. That is the law, and they could not exceed that amount?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. BLACK. It would not be necessary to put in any limitation?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. I think at some time we shall have to enlarge that limitation of $4 in connection with certain classes of people, because I think it is not covering their actual expenses in some instances; but I think the limitation as it exists applies to the council without need of further legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS.

The limitation upon the amount which may be expended for office rent in the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1918, contained in the naval appropriation act approved March 4, 1917, is increased from $1,500 to $2,332.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to obtain information from the chairman of the committee as to whether the subcommittee made any provision or any inquiry as to allowing additional rental to the Vocational Educational Board?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; we did not.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a bill pending in the House granting them additional authority for rental purposes in the District of Columbia, and I wished to know whether the committee took any action on that subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. We did not, because there was nothing formal before the committee. A gentleman called informally to see me touching the matter to which the gentleman from Wisconsin refers. That bill, in my judgment, ought not to become a law, because it would take all the funds that they have available for this purpose. Something undoubtedly ought to be done in connection with taking care of their rent situation, but the committee did not and ought not to consider matters that do not come before them in the regular way. At the time I had the talk with the gentleman I suggested that the way that matter would probably be considered would be by the submission of a proper estimate; and I still think that is the way to have it considered.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman recognizes the need of some authorization to this board to provide authority for them to pay for their present quarters.

Mr. SHERLEY. They have an actual deficiency and it will have to be paid; but there are some things in connection with that situation that I think are not altogether to be commended. The committee did not feel that they ought to deal with the matter without a formal request.

I will say further, in reply to the gentleman, that there are a number of things that will probably have to be picked up in the Senate. The committee found itself in a situation where, if it was to report the bill at all, it had to draw a dead line touching new estimates. We could be considering this bill yet if we had permitted the departments to continue to send estimates down; so we finally served notice that estimates that came in thereafter fell outside the dead line and that they would have to be taken up in the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For additional employees in the Department of State, $50,000: Provided, That not more than four persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the committee kindly explain the reason for granting to the Department of State this additional $50,000 for clerical services here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHERLEY. A part of it was for the purpose of providing for the continuation of the pay of employees that they now have. A part of it represents an increase in the number of such employees. Broadly speaking, the situation is this: The State Department has had and will continue to have a very great expansion under present conditions, and it was important that they not only have additional clerical help, but that to a limited extent they have additional high-paid help, and therefore the provision is carried that not more than four persons may be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum. The reason for this is that there is a certain character of confidential work, the gathering together of intelligences that come to the Government not only through the State Department but through naval and military sources, and work in connection with the War-Trade Board, that require men of very high grade, who could not be expected to be obtained for $1,800.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that these employees are to be engaged in clerical work? Or will they be employed in other capacities?

Mr. SHERLEY. Most of them will be clerks, except these four, who will be engaged in work of a good deal higher order than just purely clerical work. And as I stated, a large part of it will be in connection with the handling and arranging of the intelligences that are received through the State, military, naval, and other agencies of the Government, and which the gentleman will appreciate is a matter of first magnitude and value at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have had this very problem under consideration in connection with the framing of the legislative appropriation bill. The estimate in that connection is for $120,000 and the revised estimate for the next fiscal year is $264,000. The phraseology is somewhat different, and I was wondering whether there is any need of having it in the form of additional employees. As carried in the estimate for the legislative bill the phraseology is "for additional clerical services, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State."

Mr. SHERLEY. As I recall, the request before the subcommittee of which the gentleman is a member was to change the language in which the estimate was originally submitted into language corresponding with this which is now carried in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. That may be.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman will find that is the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have a note on my copy of the bill, making some suggestions along that line, but I do not recall distinctly whether we were to strike out "clerical services," and just say "additional employees."

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it was desired that we should use the language employed herein.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Post allowances to consular and diplomatic officers: To enable the President, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $400,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the committee has extended the authority of the existing phraseology in the diplomatic bill so as to authorize the Department of State to increase the salaries of the consular and diplomatic representatives at all posts rather than the authority, as conferred in the last Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, to our consular and diplomatic officers of a belligerent country and countries adjacent thereto.

Mr. SHERLEY. This language is in exact accord with the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill as it passed the House. The reason for the change in that bill and in this was this: The need was not confined simply to belligerent countries and to nonbelligerent countries designated heretofore. For instance, there are South American countries where the condition is more acute than it is abroad in the warring countries and countries adjacent to the warring countries. A statement presented by the State Department was of such unquestioned need that we could not do otherwise. For instance, it developed in one instance that there was a loss on exchange of 25 per cent. In other words, the salary of the man stationed there was reduced 25 per cent by the exchange loss. We simply allowed a sum that, in the discretion of the Secretary of State, might enable him to equitably deal with these people.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the Secretary of State advise the committee whether he intended to pursue a uniform policy in all countries with reference to the salaries of diplomatic and consular representatives?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I do not know that it is possible to pursue a uniform course. I do say that it would be dependent on the actual situation and need. There are some places where a very slight increase might be necessary, or none at all, and there are other places where there would have to be a large allowance made. There was no way of our undertaking to determine the matter except by general consideration of the situation and the appropriation of a sum that would not permit of great extravagance and yet would relieve the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the bill which passed the House last Saturday, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, there is an authorization of $800,000, which is virtually 50 per cent of the salaries paid to the consular and diplomatic officers.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his figures.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have the bill here.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not mistaken in the amount of $800,000, but the amount of the salaries to the consular and diplomatic officers—it is more than $1,600,000 I think.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will give the gentleman the figures carried in the bill. There is $534,350 to ambassadors and ministers, and for consular officers, $1,208,500.

Mr. SHERLEY. There are quite a number of other officers that the gentleman has not enumerated.

Mr. STAFFORD. This phraseology only goes to post allowances for consular and diplomatic officers.

Mr. SHERLEY. The post allowance does not mean that it is limited simply to the salaries of consular and diplomatic officers. It relates to other employees of the embassy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the phraseology broad enough to warrant that?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think so, unquestionably. We have been acting under it, and we appropriated $100,000 for officers in China and $200,000 for officers of belligerent countries at the last session.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to have the gentleman's opinion as to whether this phraseology carried in this bill, as well as in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, is broad enough to allow an allowance to others than the consular and diplomatic officers.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it says for post allowances. That means for the post; it does not mean for consular and diplomatic officers alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. The secretary to the embassy and legation is a diplomatic officer?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is a post allowance and not to consular and diplomatic officers alone. In other words, the allowance is to the post. It is not simply to increase the salary of the diplomatic officer and the consular officer, but also for his employees at the different posts.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does that include the minister or the ambassador?

Mr. SHERLEY. It might include him, but in point of fact it was not intended to include him.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does it include him, and have any of these salaries been raised?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not that I know of, but the language is broad enough to deal with all of them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They certainly ought to be, and I would be glad to know that some of them had been included.

Mr. FLOOD. It has not been paid to the minister or to the ambassador.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will read the qualifying language after the title he will find that the phraseology is limited to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at posts to which they may be assigned.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the word "officers" there means clerks, as well as diplomatic and consular officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not say "officer"; it says "officers."

Mr. SHERLEY. "Officers" means more than simply the head officer. The clerk is an officer within the meaning of this.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not construe the word "clerk" to be an officer.

Mr. SHERLEY. It has been so construed. The gentleman can be perfectly sure that if that were not true the State Department would have asked for a change of language.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am glad to have the statement of the gentleman that this authorization means not only, as it apparently does on its face, to provide additional compensation to officers, but that it can be used also for the secretarial force or the clerical force.

Mr. SHERLEY. They need it more than the others.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know that, but there is no provision in express language covering their cases.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it does cover their cases.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] says these are never paid to the ministers or ambassadors.

Mr. FLOOD. I say it has not yet.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Therefore it must be paid to the clerks and secretaries.

The Clerk read as follows:

For washing and hemming towels, purchase of awnings and fixtures, window shades and fixtures, alcohol, benzine, turpentine, varnish, baskets, belting, bellows, bowls, brooms, buckets, brushes, canvas, crash, cloth, chamois skins, cotton waste, door and window fasteners, dusters; flower-garden, street, and engine hose; lace leather, lye, nails, oils, plants, picks, pitchers, powders, stencil plates, hand stamps and repairs of same, spittoons, soap, matches, match safes, sponges, tacks, traps, thermometers, toilet paper, tools, towels, towel racks, tumblers, wire, zinc, and for blacksmithing, repairs of machinery, removal of rubbish, sharpening tools, street car tickets not exceeding $250, advertising for proposals, and for sales at public auction in Washington, D. C., of condemned property belonging to the Treasury Department, payment of auctioneer fees, and purchase of other absolutely necessary articles, $3,500.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I notice in this item and in one or two other items in the bill, an amount specified for street car tickets. I wish to ask if it is the practice to pay the street car transportation of the employees in these departments, or for what purpose these street car tickets are used?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the usual language carried in the regular appropriation. The enumeration was to prevent the amount being exceeded, and simply applies to those cases where messengers or employees are sent on official business and are given street car tickets for that purpose. It is not the practice nor should it be the practice to pay the car fare of employees generally.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of officers and employees, $1,268,000; furniture, equipment, and supplies, including not exceeding $100 for street car tickets, $121,000; traveling expenses, including not exceeding $4 per diem in lieu of subsistence, $24,000; telegraph and telephone service, $4,800; stationery and miscellaneous expenses, including subscriptions to periodicals, $20,000; printing and binding, $60,000; rental of quarters, $40,000; in all, $1,537,800.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee if this appropriation is to cover a deficiency in salaries of officers and employees, in addition to the appropriation which was made when that bureau was authorized?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. The money that was appropriated then would not have carried it to any extent. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was given, and they have had $500,000 from the President, which I spoke of in my general address, and which they asked to have returned, but which we are not returning. This sum of $1,537,800 is to carry them up to July. I think this ought to be said about the War-Risk Bureau: They have had a very unusual task. It is no small matter to organize a bureau to deal with a million or more of men in the service, to arrange the allowances that should be made to dependents under the law, to take care of the insurance phase of the law, and to carry on the other activities that existed under the old law relative to insurance of ships and crews. They are getting under way and have now gotten out all of the November and December checks. They have been aided in their organization by the Bureau of Efficiency. The hearings disclose some of the problems and some of the waste that they have undertaken to meet. They have been seriously handicapped by lack of space, and they should and will have, I hope, before we are through, housing capacity in a fireproof building.

They are now scattered around through the National Museum and a number of other places. They have been doing an efficient work, considering their difficulties. The committee allowed them all that they thought they could properly expend between now and July 1, because we believed that everybody in this Congress and this country wanted to make sure the prompt and efficient payment of moneys to the dependents of the boys who were at the front. We have not tried to restrict them unnecessarily. We hope we have supplied them with funds enough for them to go forward economically and take care of this work.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state the number of employees in this very important bureau?

Mr. SHERLEY. They have about 1,700 now. The gentleman will find in the hearings a detailed statement as to the number and compensation of employees at that time. They expect to have about 1,200 more employees.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman allow me to state that it so happened that I made an inquiry of the department on that very question last Saturday, and at that time they had over 2,000 employees and had issued $7,000,000,000 of insurance.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's information is a month later than mine. I, of necessity, have to speak of the date of the hearing, and that was about a month ago. At that time they had 1,700.

Mr. TREADWAY. I had the information last Saturday night, and they had then over 2,000.

Mr. WALSH. I am indebted to the gentleman from Kentucky for the information he has given and agree with him that there should be no desire to be parsimonious in the allowance to this bureau. And I am also very much interested to learn that the delay in sending out these checks is being obviated, because I have had several communications and inquiries in reference to the allotment to soldiers, and I understand the delay——

Mr. SHERLEY. I think they are catching up very rapidly, and they expect to be able to stay current. I want to say another thing that may interest the gentleman. I suggested during the hearing, and probably it had been suggested before, that it was greatly desirable that every soldier should have a number that he should always retain, and that the attempt to classify him by name, regiment, company, State, or locality would end necessarily in confusion. That prophecy was more than verified by the very unfortunate loss of life recently in connection with the sinking of one of our transports.

It is my understanding now that the War Department proposes, in connection with the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, to give a number, which shall remain the same always, to all of our men in the service.

Mr. WALSH. And that will be done for the military branch of the service, for identification for all purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The same number will be used always and will make a perfect identification.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional clerks from March 1 to June 30, 1918, inclusive, at rates of compensation as follows: Clerks—1 of class 4 and 1 of class 1; in all, $1,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee if any request was made from the Secret Service Division of the Treasury for an appropriation to permit that division or branch of the department to increase its force of secret-service men. I understand that they do not have a very large force of men, and that a great deal of the so-called secret-service work is being performed by the bureau in the Department of Justice, and upon inquiry which I have made from time to time of the Treasury Department they stated that they are not able to increase their force because the appropriation is so limited.

Mr. SHERLEY. They did not ask in this bill for anything of the kind. They asked for $1,500, which was based on the additional clerks needed from January to June 30, and we gave them $1,000, because this bill will not become a law before March, and, figuring at the rate of four months instead of six months, it makes $1,000.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know in connection with any other measure which may come from his committee whether there is any proposition to increase the number of employees in that bureau?

Mr. SHERLEY. My impression is there is an increase asked in the sundry civil bill.

We increased their number slightly last year, and as far as I understand there is a request for an increase now.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The unexpended balance of appropriation of $100,000 contained in the deficiency appropriation act approved October 6, 1917, for repairs, alterations, and extensions of certain buildings and their equipment belonging to the United States on squares No. 226 and No. 228 in the city of Washington, is made available for the repair, alteration, and extension of such buildings and their equipment belonging to the United States on square No. 227, in the city of Washington, as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, to fit them for temporary use by the Treasury Department.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman state where these buildings are located?

Mr. SHERLEY. These buildings are located catacorner from the Treasury Department at Fifteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, and extend southerly. There are three squares of buildings there. The old Poli Theater is on part of it. And in that connection I want to say for the benefit of the gentleman and the committee that there has been submitted to the Congress an estimate from the Treasury Department looking to the acquirement of the Arlington site and the erection there of a building for the housing of the Internal Revenue Bureau and the War-Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. WALSH. The Hotel Arlington?

Mr. SHERLEY. Where the old Hotel Arlington was. That estimate came to the committee too late for it to give it consideration, and it is too important a matter to be acted on without full hearing and consideration. The proposal is for an expenditure of about $4,200,000, which would acquire the land and give us a 10-story building and an annex.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? Is not there a building in the process of erection?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is, but it is only in process of erection, and this would acquire the ground and take over the contracts and the fabricated steel—some 80 or 90 per cent of which is already fabricated—and may offer the solution of the housing needs of the Treasury Department, because the proposals made in this bill for buildings are not sufficient to take care of the Treasury needs.

Mr. WALSH. That would be a fireproof building?

Mr. SHERLEY. A permanent building.

Mr. NORTON. As to the building that is going up on the Arlington site now, south of the University Club, has the contract been made for the rent of that by the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I was just saying that an estimate had been submitted by the Treasury Department asking for an appropriation of $4,200,000 for the acquiring of the property and taking over of the contract for certain portions of the material, and erecting that building to some 10 stories in height.

Mr. NORTON. The building that is now being put up there is being put up, I understand, by private parties, with the expectation of renting it, though, to the Federal Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know anything about their expectations. There has no assurance been given of any kind, and there is no authority as yet for the rental of it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit? Is it being built as an office building or as a hotel? I refer to this building that is in the course of erection.

Mr. SHERLEY. It started out originally as a hotel, I think, but is now being erected as an office building.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

In the committee this afternoon we had up the subject, and perhaps the chairman of the committee made investigations in his subcommittee as to the Government taking possession of the property to the west of the Poli Theater that for a number of years has been occupied by a moderate-priced hotel. That property would be suitable, I would say, for office purposes, and no testimony has ever been advanced by any of the Treasury officials as to whether that property was available for office purposes or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I have made no personal investigation, but it is my understanding that the Treasury Department did, and reported that the size of the rooms and the character of them were such as not to make it worth while to take over the property. It is under a lease, which can be canceled, of course, but I think there is a 30-day limit to it. Now, personally, I know nothing as to the property. I understand the rental is a fair rental as rentals went in the old days, and that the property is not of such a character as to lend itself readily to use by the Government for office purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Detroit, Mich.: Attendants' quarters building, $31,500.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, might I inquire of the chairman of the committee when he expects the committee to rise?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I hope very shortly to move to rise. I thought we might run through some of these Treasury items, which would carry us to the District of Columbia items, and the committee could then rise. That will probably take five minutes, unless we strike something that is a matter of controversy, in which event I will move to rise then.

The Clerk read as follows:

New York (Stapleton): Remodeling old white house for attendants' quarters, psychiatric units, female nurses' quarters, ambulance house, junior medical officers' quarters (temporary), temporary hospital ward unit, and approach work; mechanical equipment, including refrigerating plant, telephone and bedside call systems, $256,500; miscellaneous furniture and equipment, $45,000; in all, $301,500.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman from Kentucky state what the general policy of the department is with reference to the extension and remodeling of these marine hospitals?

Mr. SHERLEY. It was to provide for an increase of 744 beds in the marine hospitals. There has been an increased demand upon the marine hospitals, aside from the demands that would come incident to the war. Under our compensation law governmental employees who are injured are eligible to treatment in such hospitals, and then the growth of the merchant marine and the growth of the naval service have put added demands upon the marine hospitals.

The Public Health Service presented plans for the improvement of a number of marine hospitals. The gentleman will find them enumerated throughout the bill. We allowed them, with a cut of practically 10 per cent that was made because there were certain items in connection with officers' quarters and attendants' quarters that seemed to us to be extravagant. I recall that at Boston, Mass., it was proposed to build a $16,000 frame house of eight rooms. The committee thought that a little skill would enable them to build an eight-room frame house for less than $16,000. They considered the matter carefully, and were led to believe that the necessary quarters can be provided without spending so much money from the Treasury. We feel sure that can be done.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state whether the extension or remodeling of these marine hospitals was induced by a possible demand owing to the return in the future of men injured in the service?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. There has been a presidential order making the marine hospitals open for the use of the Navy, and I have no doubt that if the need should arise they could be used for the Army as well, and probably will be.

Mr. WALSH. I assume that in this remodeling it is an attempt to modernize the equipment?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is in a sense; but the gentleman will find the details set out under each heading. The purpose largely was to increase bed capacity.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky how much longer he desires the committee to sit before he will move to rise?

Mr. SHERLEY. I just stated that if we could read until we reached the heading, "District of Columbia," on page 18, I would move to rise. It will take only a few minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

For engravers' and printers' materials and other materials except distinctive paper, miscellaneous expenses, including paper for internal-revenue stamps, and for purchase, maintenance, and driving of necessary motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, when, in writing, ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury, $400,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire as to what is the reason for authorizing the purchase of passenger-carrying vehicles under the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is just the usual language. It is the current language. This $400,000 was not for commercial vehicles at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the purpose of my inquiry, whether it was planned to authorize the bureau or the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to purchase a passenger-carrying vehicle.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was not. If we had changed the language it probably would mean the opening of a new account on the Treasury books.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9867) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JONES of Texas for 10 days, on account of serious illness in his family.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting deficiency estimate of appropriation required by the United States Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, for maintenance and ordinary expenses of the Quarantine Service (H. SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 16, 1918.

(Legislative day of Friday, February 15, 1918.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Henderson	Overman	Tillman
Chamberlain	James	Saulsbury	Townsend
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Shafroth	Trammell
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Sheppard	Underwood
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Smith, Mich.	Vardaman
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Smith, S. C.	Warren
France	Kellogg	Smoot	Watson
Gallinger	Knox	Swanson	Weeks
Hale	Lodge	Thomas	Williams
Hardwick	McCumber	Thompson	Wolcott

Mr. JAMES. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. MCNARY, Mr. NEW, Mr. OWEN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. REED, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. STONE, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to state that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent owing to illness.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. HARDING, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. KING, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. STERLING, Mr. MARTIN, and Mr. NORRIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I wish to announce that on Tuesday next after the routine morning business, with the consent of the Senate, I shall speak to the pending bill and the demonstrated necessity for Government ownership.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, it is very evident that for the time being at least the attention of Senators is given to certain hearings, investigations, and so forth, and Senators are going to committee rooms rather than appearing on the floor of the Senate. So it is almost impossible for us to keep a quorum here, at least to keep enough Senators here to justify business in debating the pending measure.

I wish to give notice now that on Monday next I shall make an effort to have some definite time fixed at which we shall get a vote on this bill. It seems to me that if the procedure we have followed up to the present is to be kept up, it might be a very good plan to adjourn the Senate until the work of the investigating committees has ceased.

Mr. THOMAS. Or adjourn sine die.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As the Senator from Colorado suggests, it might be very well to adjourn sine die and let the business of the country be transacted in the committee rooms. But be that as it may, it is useless to try to keep up this procedure that seems to be more or less a farce.

If the Senate is convinced as to the merits or demerits of this bill, I think we can conserve time and it would be of benefit to the country by bringing it to a vote. It is the most important measure that has been before this body in a generation or longer, and it is not receiving the attention that its importance entitles it to receive. I shall attempt to bring the matter to a close at the earliest possible time by a vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest to the Senator that the very moment we agree upon a time to vote then we shall not have anyone here to listen to the discussion.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then it will not change the situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be wise for the Senate to revoke the permission that we have granted committees to sit while the Senate is in session, especially when such an important measure as this is under consideration?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think that is a splendid suggestion, but I am still of opinion that if Senators would really realize—not know, for perhaps they do know, but realize—the importance of this measure and the importance of an early determination of it they could suspend some of the hearings. I am of opinion that we have gotten into the habit of paying more attention to something that is sensational than to the fundamental principles to which we as Senators ought to devote ourselves.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina. If the Senate would agree that a certain number of hours should be set apart for the consideration of this bill, and the Senate would order the committees to withhold their hearings within that period, the Senate in that way might have the presence of its membership to hear the discussion, and especially if we should have an agreement that speeches should not exceed 30 minutes, so that the Senate would not be exhausted by very long speeches but would still be able to get the different points of view of Senators on the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The suggestions indicate that there is a necessity for having some understanding. So I give notice now that on Monday I shall make an effort to have some definite time fixed at which we can vote upon the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There are a number of subcommittees at work to-day. One of which I am a member will probably finish its work this afternoon. If the Senate should adjourn until Monday and the Senators are given notice that the rule permitting committees to sit during the session should be revoked for the purpose of inducing the Senators to attend upon the deliberations of the Senate pending the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, I think it would result in a full attendance Monday morning and meet with the approval of Senators generally. I realize the necessity for immediate action upon the pending bill. It is a measure of far-reaching importance and ought to be passed upon at the earliest possible moment, and the suggestion I have made is for the purpose of facilitating its passage.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, time is too precious to waste. I do not say waste any of the arguments, but to waste any more time in the process of getting to some kind of an end of this matter. I do not think that I shall ask for any adjournment until Monday. I will let the debate take its course, even though it requires Senators to speak to empty benches, and I repeat that on Monday I shall make an effort to have a day fixed for a final vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to say a word to the chairman of the committee before he takes his seat, in view of the notice he has given. There is no Senator who is more anxious than I am to facilitate the disposition of this bill, and no Senator deplores more than I do the fact that the majority of the Members of the Senate are sitting in committees where they think their work is imperative. But we shall have to choose between work in committees and work on the floor of the Senate. If Senators are free and do not choose to occupy their seats, that is a privilege that they must be permitted to exercise. But a very large part of the Senate is not free. It is sitting in committees considering important legislation, and it is perfectly absurd and indefensible for the Senate to have under consideration a bill of this character and permit its important committees to sit for the consideration of measures which demand the attention of Senators elsewhere.

I have said this as a prelude to the suggestion that notwithstanding my great desire to speed the disposition of this bill there will be no unanimous consent to fix a time to vote upon the bill until there has been a fair opportunity to debate it upon the floor of the Senate, and there will be no fair opportunity to debate the bill until these committees cease their sittings and are at liberty at least to attend the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it seems to me in order to get the attention of Senators to the proceedings of this body it might be arrived at by setting apart a certain number of hours each day in which the bill would be debated and during which time the committees would be requested by the Senate not to sit but the Members to attend the sessions of the Senate. It is a very important bill, and I think Senators ought to debate it and ought to hear it debated; but without any plan it is obvious that the committees will go on as they have in the past, and if the members of those committees are not present to hear the discussion of the bill Senators feel that they ought to repeat things which they have said before as they get the different membership present. If we could get the Senate together to consider this bill within a certain number of hours each day, it could be debated to the satisfaction of every Member of the Senate and at the same time the Senate would really hear the discussion.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is precisely in the line of my suggestion.

Mr. OWEN. Can we not reach some plan?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the committees would meet in the morning and the Senate not meet until 2 o'clock and divide the day in that manner, it would be perfectly satisfactory, I am sure, to everyone. But without thinking of myself or of any other member of the committee, it is not fair to the Interstate Commerce Committee, to the chairman of the committee, who has devoted a great deal of time to this subject, to allow him to bring forward a bill and have it considered under such circumstances as to prevent any full or fair consideration of it.

If an arrangement can be made through which a day can be divided in that way, I shall be perfectly content; but I am not willing that the bill shall be voted upon with the greater number of Senators occupied in their committee rooms and so occupied that they can not possibly be here. I do not know whether or not they could get excused to come here to vote upon the bill. It may be that they might be relieved for that one act.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it seems to me we are wasting a good deal of time over a subject which, however long we may discuss it, will not amount to much. I think the attendance of Senators in the Chamber is just about as numerous when committees are not sitting as when they are sitting. I know of no manner in which Senators can be compelled to remain here unless we change our rules. We might close our cloakrooms, and possibly the restaurant, and by that means shut off all other places of entertainment and make those who are not attracted here by the speeches come here for want of a place offering better opportunities for entertainment.

The fact is that Senators do not and will not remain here during the discussion of important measures, except occasionally, and the sessions of the committees and the absence of those sessions neither of them in my judgment affects the average attendance of Senators upon the floor during the discussion of bills. So let us go on and discuss this measure and reach a vote as soon as we can.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is a great deal of force in what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has said. It may be that we would not have much of an attendance on the floor if committees were not in session, but there are Members of the Senate who want to hear this debate and who do have important committee hearings which they also desire to attend. There ought to be an arrangement, at least for those who want to hear the discussion, to be able to be here without neglecting some other important business.

I thought yesterday, when we took a recess until 11 o'clock this morning, it was breaking in without any notice on arrangements that had already been made for hearings before some committees at least; that if the Senate met at 11 o'clock it would interfere with those. I have no objection to meeting at 11 o'clock if some other arrangement is made about committee meetings or if we could have some notice that that was going to happen in a week from now.

I desire, however, to state what actually occurred this morning in the Committee on Agriculture. The Committee on Agriculture is having hearings which are vitally important, or I think they are vitally important, on the question of the conservation of food and production of food, which will go as far as anything else in winning this war. We have been meeting in that committee and running our sessions up until 12 o'clock, with those hearings. Yesterday the committee adjourned at 12 o'clock to meet this morning and expected to run until 12 o'clock. In the meantime the Senate took a recess until 11 o'clock. That meant that those hearings were interrupted. Members of the committee were over there—I was among the number—anxious to hear the most interesting discussion of a witness who was giving us some extremely valuable information as to the condition of the live-stock and the grain-producing sections of the country. Some of us at least wanted to be here. It is impossible, however, to be at both places at the same time. The Senate took its action after the committee had adjourned, and at 11 o'clock to-day there was before the committee a man from Oklahoma——

Mr. OVERMAN rose.

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator. The president of the Farmers' Union of the State of Oklahoma, one of the most interesting witnesses, a man who is well informed, was giving us in concise language valuable information, which every Senator would be glad to read if he could not be there and hear it; but when the Senate met at 11 o'clock we had to leave in the midst of his testimony. It was not fair to those who desired to get this information; it was not fair to those who desired to be present at the hearings and who also desire to hear this debate. Now I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say, along the line of what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has been saying, that no notice was given of the intention of the Senate to meet at 11 o'clock this morning, and that in the Committee on Appropriations we had under consideration one of the great appropriation bills.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. OVERMAN. At 11 o'clock, the usual time, not knowing that the Senate had taken a recess until 11 o'clock this morning, a meeting of the committee was called; but as soon as we got that notice, we adjourned the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. OVERMAN. There ought to be some notice of such intention on the part of the Senate, so that the chairmen of committees should be aware of it when they call meetings of committees.

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly. What the Senator says merely bears out what I have stated. I wish to say that the witness before our committee, to whom I have referred, had made arrangements to go away to-day, as he had a right to do, because we understood the committee would be able to continue in session until 12 o'clock, at least, yet because of the action of the Senate here yesterday all of these matters have been interfered with.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a few words. I shall not occupy the Senate five minutes.

I think it is known to all Senators that the Director of Railroads is very much embarrassed by the want of the legislation contemplated by the pending bill. He called me over the telephone and told me that he was delaying matters; that the whole business of railroad traffic was impeded, hindered, and delayed because of the lack of legislation that was absolutely necessary for him to carry out the purposes for which the railroads were taken over. I think the primary consideration should be with the Senate to speed this bill. I think everything ought to give way for it, and that it ought to be kept continuously before the Senate. The debate ought to be allowed to proceed in order to reach a vote as early as possible.

I am not suggesting that there should not be debate. The bill is a very important measure and Senators ought to debate it. I am not attempting to suggest that it should not be debated, but I do suggest and I do appeal to Senators to give the fullest opportunity for debate in order to speed this bill to a final vote.

I do not myself believe that any time will be gained by undertaking to change the long-accustomed usages of committee meetings. Committees will adjourn to enable their members to be in the Senate when they can do so. The Appropriations Committee had the diplomatic bill before it this morning, and it adjourned the consideration of that bill in order that its members might be on the floor of the Senate to hear the discussion of the railroad bill. I think other committees will do the same. I do not believe it would be wise to change or attempt to regulate the hours of committee meetings. I think all we can do is to keep the railroad bill continuously before the Senate and to speed its passage as far as possible. I feel that that is urgently important. I think if we will go along in the old beaten path Senators who want to be present and hear the debate can be here, just as the members of the Appropriations Committee adjourned their session so as to be present in the Senate Chamber this morning. I do not believe we shall gain any time by attempting to coerce committees by new regulations to which they are not accustomed. To just let the debate proceed, keep the bill before the Senate, and get a vote as soon as possible is what I think should appeal to every Senator on the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize the difficulty of carrying forward a discussion of the apparently uninteresting subject proposed in the bill now before the Senate. It would be a fitting tribute to the occasion if some one of my distinguished associates upon the other side of the Chamber were to move for an adjournment in order that our minds might be composed and in order that we might gradually prepare ourselves for the consideration of the questions which are before us. I am not saying this in any malicious or ill-natured spirit, for I understand perfectly that for a little while at least it is necessary that most of the Senators shall be absent from the Chamber; and I premise what I have to say with the suggestion that if presently there are no great number of Senators who take any interest in this matter I shall move to adjourn until we are better prepared to discuss the vital things that are proposed in the bill.

Day before yesterday I listened with profound interest to the eloquent homily delivered by the Senator from Illinois (Mr. LEWIS), a distinguished member of the committee which reported the bill under consideration, upon liberty, justice, independence, the equality of opportunity, and the perpetuity of democracy throughout the world. What does it avail us to thrill, as we all did, under the utterance of these lofty sentiments unless we are willing to carry into legislation the principles which he so beautifully expressed? And I am waiting with a good deal of interest to see whether he and the other members of the committee who listened to him as I did are willing to enact justice as well as proclaim it.

Why should we erect a statue to liberty, to freedom, to equality, and then at once close and lock the doors to the opportunity declared by our forefathers, and to fortify which and to perpetuate which we are now summoning all the energy of all the people of the United States?

These abstract conceptions of democracy, of equality, of justice are recognized by all people and have been recognized by all nations during all times; but the difficulty has been that we arise from the worship of the shrine of these exalted conceptions and immediately proceed to enact injustice; not consciously, for I am not suggesting a conscious purpose on the part of any Senator or any Member of Congress to do injustice. I am only calling to your attention the fact that it is infinitely easier to eulogize justice, democracy, liberty, equality, than it is to enforce these noble sentiments through the legislation which alone can secure them for the people of the country.

A few hours ago I received a letter from a distinguished educator of my State, a man who, I am sure, feels none of the prejudice which is supposed to exist against wealth or property; and I intend to take the liberty to read it, for it is very brief. He says:

> I understand the Senate will pass a bill guaranteeing the railroads an income equal to the average of the past three years. I know we do not do this for the men whom we drafted. Why are the railroads treated better than our soldiers? An answer will be appreciated.

How would you, fellow Senators, have answered the letter I have just read? How would you have distinguished the difference between taking the man from his ordinary avocation and the compensation which his energy and ability command and taking the property which he might have theretofore accumulated? There is a difference. But I mention the letter for the purpose of emphasizing the thought which is uppermost in my mind as we continue the consideration of the bill which proposes high compensation to the railroad companies whose properties have been taken over by the Government.

I answered him by saying that under our Constitution every citizen owed to his country, without compensation, without reward, his life if it became necessary to take it, but that under the same Constitution when the Government took property for the defense of the Nation it must pay just compensation for it. Whether this distinction can be defended in the court of original reason it is not for me to say, but it is pertinent here when we remember that we are about to offer compensation for railroad property of 10, 12, 15, and 20 per cent per year upon all the capital which the owners of the property have invested in its creation and construction. Whatever may be the necessities of warfare, and ours are very great at this time, there is nothing in our Constitution, nothing in our traditions, nothing in our civilization, which warrants the compensation proposed in the bill before us.

I shall confine myself at this time to the question of compensation for the use of the property which the Government has taken over and is now operating. I intend to prove—and I use the words deliberately and reflectively—that the compensation proposed in the bill is about $200,000,000 annually more than it ought to be, more than it need be, in order to fulfill the highest standard of the law and of the Constitution.

The bill proposes that the Government shall remain in possession of the properties of which it has assumed control for 18 months after the war shall have ended. None of us can predict with certainty the period of the war, but it is conservative, I think, to suggest that the bill means Government possession and operation for at least four years. The aggregate overpayment which this measure offers is, therefore, about $800,000,000. I intend to show that this vast sum is to be taken each year from the people, who are already overburdened, and to be given to the railway corporations without a shadow of right, reason, or justice.

There is but one precedent in all history for the proposal contained in the first section of the bill now before the Senate. It will be found in the Scriptures, and may be thus quoted, although I am not entirely sure of the literal accuracy of the quotation; but somewhere in the Holy Writ it is said—not approvingly, I am glad to know—

To him who hath shall be given, and from him who hath not shall be taken away, even that which he seemeth to have.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from Iowa if he is sure of the accuracy of his Scriptural quotation, if he is attempting to quote Scripture?

Mr. CUMMINS. I said that I was not absolutely sure of the literal accuracy of the quotation, but I will risk something upon its substantial accuracy.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator will yield to an expert upon the subject, I will give him the quotation accurately.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no man in the Senate to whom I would appeal more readily than to the Senator from Pennsylvania in order to know just what the Bible says upon any question.

Mr. KNOX. That is a just acknowledgment, which I very much appreciate; but the concluding line of the passage which the Senator from Iowa has quoted is "from him shall be taken away even that which he hath." The word "away," I think, is used, but the word "seemeth" is not in the quotation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I felt that way, but I might as well confess now to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I have recently read that verse of the Scriptures, and I think the word "seemeth" is in the verse.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am afraid the Senator from Pennsylvania has not read the modern version or the modern translation of the Bible. I am afraid since his boyhood he has not consulted that Book very much or he would know that the word "seemeth" is there.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to say, Mr. President, that I not only insist that I am correct, but that I would not have ventured to have undertaken to correct the Senator from Iowa if he had not just a few moments ago disavowed that he had recently looked the quotation up.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not disavow that.

Mr. KNOX. That was the impression made on my mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said I was not sure of the literal accuracy of my quotation. Mr. President, might I ask the Secretary of the Senate to produce his Bible, and to read that verse in the Scriptures?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator from Iowa might have said that this was stated by the Master in the Sermon on the Mount; and while the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. KNOX) is correct according to the Gospel of St. Matthew, the Senator from Iowa is correct according to the Gospel of St. Mark.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is evident that the Senator from Pennsylvania never got further than the first book of the New Testament. It really is an unimportant thing, but I should be very glad if the desk would give to the Senate the full and accurate version of this quotation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Iowa that the Senate seems to be without a Bible.

Mr. CUMMINS. No matter, Mr. President, what the variation in memory may be with regard to the Bible, the thought is that it is the way of the world to give to those who have and to take away from those who have not the little they are struggling to keep. It is from that standpoint I mention the only precedent of any high authority for the proposal made by the majority of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, in behalf of the committee and for myself, before he begins a discussion of the proof that we are likely to pay or that we are going to pay the railroads $200,000,000 annually more than they are rightfully entitled to, I presume he means by that that we are now going to continue to allow the roads to earn out of their property $200,000,000 that they have been earning and have not been forbidden by any law to earn and by any process to earn any less, and that the proof which he will bring is, in effect, that for all the times of peace up to this emergency they have been earning that amount or a pro rata amount upon the property.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina has a glimmering, at least, of the thought in my mind, although he does not express it just as I should. I think he will clearly perceive the basis of the statement I made a few moments ago as I proceed with my argument, and I tell him now, and I tell the Senate now, that every fact which I shall use upon the point just made will be found in tables that have been prepared by and been furnished to me by the Interstate Commerce Commission or the statistical bureau of that body, with this exception, that I take one fact from the report of the majority of the committee, now so ably represented by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator just a question. The Senator can not say, and he is not saying, that the committee in this proposed law is allowing the railroads $200,000,000 annually more than they were making before this war period?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is the point I was making.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not make any such assertion, although I may accompany what I said with the statement that, in my judgment, we are allowing the railroads nearly $200,000,000 more than they would earn during the next few years if the property were to remain in their possession and under their control.

Mr. President, the question presents an issue so big in principle and so tremendous in consequences—for its consequences are not confined to the mere payment of the money, vast as the sum is, during the period of Federal control—that no Member of Congress can escape it. No matter what we may do here, it will be settled finally in the highest forum of a free country.

Although I am conscious that I repeat some things that have already been said, in order to preserve continuity, I refer to the way in which the question arose and the manner in which it comes before this body. In 1916, as a part of the military appropriation bill of that year, we passed a provision which authorized the President in time of war to take possession, to assume control, and to operate the systems of transportation in the United States in order to more effectively prosecute the war. Let it be distinctly understood as I proceed that I have no criticism of that legislation; it meets my hearty approval, as it did when it was adopted by Congress. Let it be also understood that I have no objection to the act of the President in taking possession of the railroads of the United States. I am willing, and I am desirous, of making that control as effectual and as complete as it is possible to make it.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] yesterday recited very graphically, and I think very correctly, the things that had been accomplished by the railway companies in order to make their properties more efficient since the war began. There is not a single word which he uttered respecting the loyalty of the railway managers and their sincere desire to render all the assistance which they could render to the Government in its hour of peril to which I do not heartily subscribe. I think that the railway managers of the country from the 7th of April, 1917, until the 28th of December of that year when they were relieved of their responsibility by the action of the Government, accomplished almost a miracle in the better use and in the higher coordination of the transportation facilities of this country in order to meet the imperative and supreme needs of the Nation.

At the same time, I was of the opinion from the beginning—and observation and experience have only strengthened the conviction which I entertained—that it was not within the power of the railway companies to do the things which this country required to be done under the conditions which confronted and surrounded us. If there had been nothing more in the problem than the mere handling and movement of engines and cars, I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the organizations already in charge of these great enterprises could have handled and moved the cars and the traffic more efficiently than it is possible for the Government to do in the first hours of the transition, because there is a confusion incident to the change which only time can remove, and some of us are not sure that even time will obliterate the difficulties and embarrassments under which the Government must act. But there was one obstacle, fatal, insuperable, which the railway management could not overcome; there was one thing which the railway companies could not do, no matter how loyal their officers and managers were and no matter how efficient they might have been. That thing was the operation of the transportation instrumentalities of this country as a unit. That obstacle was the impossibility of treating the railroads of the United States as a single system, ignoring all corporate interest or selfish advantage. It could not have been expected and, of course, was not accomplished. Nor could the obstacle have been overcome by the repeal of the antitrust law with regard to the railroads, nor by the repeal of the antipooling provision of the interstate commerce act, because, even if the railway companies had been free to agree with each other respecting the disposition of traffic, the movement of trains, and the division of earnings, there still would have remained the natural, the inevitable desire upon the part of those who were responsible to the bondholders and stockholders of any given company to work for them as against the whole world. There was but one way to mobilize all the transportation facilities of the United States, and that was to brush aside, to eliminate every interest which the railway companies had, except the interest to serve their country.

It is for this reason that I stated in the minority views which I had the honor to present, that my only criticism of the administration was that it had not taken possession of the railways of the country immediately after the declaration of war, precisely as Great Britain did. Great Britain entered the war on the 3d or 4th day of August, 1914, and on the same day or the day following the Government took possession of all the railways of Great Britain. I modify that by saying all the railways of England, Scotland, and Wales, and within a few weeks thereafter assumed the same possession of the railways of Ireland. Great Britain knew, just as we ought to have known, that when it was desired to put into the service of the Government, shorn of every other interest, all the transportation facilities of a great country, we must remove an obstacle which could not be removed by the voluntary arrangements or agreements of the railroad companies themselves. I would have been far better satisfied if on the 8th day of April, 1917, the President had done what he did upon the 28th of December, 1917, for, if the transfer had then been accomplished, some of the chaos which is incident to a change so mighty in its character could by this time have been overcome, and we would be enjoying at this moment a more efficient transportation service than we now enjoy.

I think, too, that it is to be regretted that in the act of taking the railroads the proclamation of the President, which evidenced the purpose of the Government, was not more specific and definite. We do not know what railroads have been taken over.

There is no human being who knows how much of the 250,000 miles of American railways is now in possession of the Government. There has been no action on the part of the Government with respect to any one system or any one railway that has not been taken with regard to every railway in the country; and the director general declared before our committee that the notices, giving an account of the President's proclamation, which were sent out to all the railway companies of the United States, were not to be construed as a declaration upon the part of the Government that the companies or railroads to which these notices were sent had been taken over. Nobody knows at this moment whether the 1,800,000 men who are now operating these properties are working for the Government or are working for their respective corporations. Nobody knows whether the millions of dollars which are pouring every day into the treasuries of these companies belong to the United States or whether they belong to the railway corporations. There is great danger of a destruction of the morale of the service in view of this unfortunate uncertainty.

I mention these things, Mr. President, not for the purpose of arraying myself in opposition to the administration with regard to its action in the matter, but as expressive only of my regret that the action was not sooner taken and was not more certain and definite in its character.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. It is rather presumptuous upon the part of a Senator who is not a member of this important committee and who has not had the advantages that have accrued from listening to the testimony offered in the hearings to make any suggestions with respect to the question which the Senator is now discussing; but does it not seem to the Senator that his criticism of the taking over of all of the railroads and his suggestion that the morale of the service is now deleteriously affected is rather unfair and unwarranted? Could the President have acted other than in the manner in which he did act? Was it not better, and was it not the only way, to take all of the railroads, and then, by a policy of exclusion, remit to private management and control again those that were found to be unnecessary for the public defense?

As I understand, if the Senator will pardon me further, in taking over the roads there has been no attempt to interfere with the management of the roads. Directors, presidents, and superintendents have been left in control, and the employees are as they were prior to the 26th day of December, 1917. There is a constructive possession by the Government, not an actual physical one, and nothing has been done by the Government to interfere with the operation of the roads under the control of those who in the days and years passed have been controlling and operating them. So I ask does not the Senator think that his criticism is rather too severe in respect to this course of procedure?

Mr. CUMMINS. It might be said, Mr. President, that my criticism is immaterial, but it is not severe. The Government knew or, from my standpoint, ought to have known when possession was taken of the transportation systems of the country, that they must all be taken. It is a figment of the imagination, I think, to insist that the Government may go forward gradually and ascertain just which of these railroads it desires to continue to operate. If the Government were taking possession of the railroads for military purposes only, there would be much weight in the suggestion just made by the Senator from Utah; but the Government has taken possession of these railroads for all purposes. The direct service to the Government is very small as compared to the service rendered in general commerce. General commerce must go forward. It must continue unabated, and we hope with accelerated vigor. All the railroads, or all the competitive railroads at least, are necessary in order to carry this commerce; and I am not a believer in the theory which apparently prevails in some quarters that the Government ought to take possession of a little part or even a large part of the entire system and exclude a great number of properties which depend for their existence and for their maintenance upon the continued relation with the properties that may be taken over by the Government. That is a difference in view.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. In order that I may get more accurately the viewpoint of the Senator from Iowa on this subject, does the Senator feel that the Executive should be required to take over a road or a system that he does not need?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator is aware of the fact that in some sections of the country—in many large areas, perhaps—there is not that pressing need for Federal control and operation of railway lines that exists in the East; and the Senator feels that if the President takes over one railroad he should be required to take over all? Do I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The Senator from Arkansas knows my view upon that subject——

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not sure that I do.

Mr. CUMMINS (continuing). Because I have introduced an amendment which covers my thought in the matter. I do not want to discuss that amendment at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. I referred to the action of the President in a purely preliminary way, in rather a historical way.

Mr. ROBINSON. If a road is constructively taken over—and I think the Senator will understand what I mean by that—notice is given that it is taken over, but no interference is in fact put into operation by the Executive. In that case would any legal damage accrue to that railroad by reason of the alleged constructive taking over?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think any legal damage occurs.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then what would be the harmful effect of giving the Executive the opportunity of making the necessary investigation to satisfy himself as to just what lines are needed, if the constructive taking of the property does not work any legal damage to the railroad?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I attempted to say a few moments ago that I thought the railroad systems of this country must be considered as a unit when the Government is operating them, and that is the one reason which made it necessary for the Government to take them from the possession of their owners and submit them to public operation. If that reason did not exist, then, in my judgment, the President has acted without authority.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I correctly understand the Senator's viewpoint, it is that if the Executive takes a line of railroad he should also be required to take all competing lines.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my opinion. I do not intend to discuss that in connection with section 1, however.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand. I only asked the Senator that question because at this time he was, as I construed his remarks, criticising the Executive for the manner of the taking.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sorry that a mere expression of difference of opinion with regard to the best way in which to have proceeded is to be construed as a criticism. I do not look upon it as a criticism. I do not want to stand in the attitude of criticising a policy in which I thoroughly believe; but I hope I may be at liberty, without offense, to express the notion that it would have been more effective and more just if the action of the Government had covered the properties which are necessarily affected by the action.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will say to the Senator, and then I will not interrupt him further on this point, that my use of the word "criticism" was exactly in that sense. I assumed that the statement that the taking over could have been accomplished in another way was at least an implied criticism; but I did not use the word "criticism" in any objectionable sense, and, of course, I concede the Senator's right——

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will understand that all I am trying to do is to reach the truth of this matter, and that I intend to treat every difference of opinion with the utmost toleration. I so often need indulgence of that kind myself that I am not inclined to bear very hardly upon those who may differ from me about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope I have not said anything to imply that the Senator from Arkansas has any other desire or any other purpose in connection with the matter. I concede the Senator's right and his duty to express his views.

Mr. CUMMINS. Passing from the act of 1916, which is the origin of the authority which has been exercised by the President, permit me to say, Mr. President, that the next visible step taken in this course was in the proclamation of the President, issued, I think, on the 28th day of December, 1917. I have already indicated my view of that act on the part of the President. I think he had reached a time or confronted conditions of a character which made it absolutely necessary to do the thing which he did; and the logical outcome of the thing he did was to take possession of the entire transportation system of the country, because he proposed, and the Government now proposes, to render general service to the people of the United States in the transportation of their persons and their properties, entirely removed from the mere prosecution of the war or the transportation of war material.

Having introduced it in this way, I call your attention to the first section of the bill, for it is this section which gives rise to the question I am discussing. The part of it upon which I desire to comment reads:

That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation—

I beg you to note that the word "railroads" is not in the act of 1916. It is not in the proclamation of the President. It is not in the statement issued by the President which accompanied the proclamation. It was inserted in the bill by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I think very unfortunately inserted. I might as well explain it now, although it has nothing to do with the compensation that is to be agreed upon between the railroads and the country. It is unfortunate because it permits a railroad which is owned and controlled by another railroad to enter the Court of Claims and secure what the Constitution denominates just compensation for the use of that particular road, although it has been fully compensated for in dealing with the system of which that railroad is a part.

As an illustration, take the Union Pacific road as the system, and the Oregon Short Line Railroad as one of its parts. The Union Pacific Railroad owns the stock of the Oregon Short Line. There may have been a recent consolidation; I do not know. It owns practically all of the stock of the Oregon Short Line. So far as the business done over the continuous rails which stretch from Omaha to Portland is concerned, the Union Pacific can determine just what division of those earnings shall be made. It can give the Oregon Short Line a mileage division, or it can give it a larger or a lesser part of the earnings upon through business, and substantially all of the business is of that character. The Union Pacific enters into an agreement with the Governement under the standard that is here proposed, reaping the full benefits of the earnings of all its properties. The Oregon Short Line says: "We will not enter into any agreement with the Government. We will appeal to the condemnation tribunal here created, and finally to the Court of Claims, and secure an award with respect to the value of the use of our properties," although every beneficial use of that property has passed to the Union Pacific, which has already entered into an agreement with the Government.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if it is not a fact that the committee inserted the word "railroads" in order to cover a case of this kind: There may be some single short-line railroad not connected with any interstate system of roads, and the committee thought it would be wise to use the word "railroads" so that if the President saw fit to take over that line the President could do it. It was not put in there, as I understand, for any purpose of the kind now mentioned by the Senator, and this is the first time I have ever heard that mentioned. Is it not a fact that in the case mentioned by the Senator—the case of the Union Pacific and the Oregon Short Line, the President is not obliged to make any arrangement with the Union Pacific unless the Oregon Short Line comes in as a part of the system, and the roads have no rights whatever that the President is not willing to give them?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I entirely acquit the committee of any design to enhance the sum which we are called upon to guarantee to the railway companies by the introduction of the word "railroads"; and I am quite willing to accept the view just stated by the Senator from Minnesota as to the reason in the minds of the members of the committee when that word was inserted. I only say that it is capable of indefinite abuse. When you remember that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., for instance, has within it more than a hundred railway corporations—I think I am very much beneath the number, possibly—when you remember that the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific own all the stock of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co.; when you remember that the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. controls, through stock ownership or leases, practically all the railroads in the southwestern part of the country, you can easily see how the use of a word of this kind, employed for a perfectly proper purpose, may be used for a very improper purpose. I was only commenting on it as I passed, because I think before we have finished the bill we ought in some way to limit the compensation of these properties which are parts of a system already under an agreement with the Government.

I proceed with the reading, although I am bound to say that I think when the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in 1916 used the term "systems of transportation" he had a more accurate and comprehensive view of the thing to be accomplished than the Senators who put into the bill subsequently the word "railroads."

That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation not exceeding an annual sum (herein called standard return), payable in reasonable installments, for each year and prorata for any fractional year of such Federal control, equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income (including therein such income of lines acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with such carrier between July 1, 1914, and December 31, 1917) for the three years ended June 30, 1917, and in addition thereto an annual sum payable likewise in reasonable installments reckoned at a rate per centum to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions or betterments, less retirements, or road extensions, made during the six months ended December 31, 1917.

It is, Mr. President, to the standard of compensation declared in that part of the section which I have read to which I especially object. I happened to receive a few days ago a circular letter issued by Carpenter & Co., of Washington. It is typical of a great many circular letters that are being issued concerning this bill and I want to read a very little part of it. It begins:

DEAR SIR: If you contemplate investing in any of the standard railroad or industrial stocks on the New York Stock Exchange, the inclosed list, showing present and past earnings, will no doubt be very interesting.

There is every reason to believe that the legislation outlined by President Wilson will be carried into effect at an early date and earnings of railroads guaranteed as indicated by the double stars, consequently such roads as Union Pacific, Reading, Atchison, Great Northern, Northern and Southern Pacific are particularly attractive.

I need not read more of this letter, and I produce it only for the purpose of showing the effect which this proposed legislation is producing in the minds of those who are interesed in the selling and buying of railway securities.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks a circular letter sent out by a broker to sell stock is a fair piece of evidence to submit to the Senate as to the reasonableness of any bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. The letter that I submit is perfectly fair, for I shall prove before I am through that all the statements made in the letter and in the circular attached to it are based upon irrefutable facts, and after all it is the public estimate of what given legislation will do for a particular interest that is valuable when we come to consider the public mind. Attached to this letter there is a circular which is dated New York, January 25, 1918. It is headed:

The record below of earnings includes those of many railroad issues to date. The double stars after figures given indicate the net earnings that would be allowed if plans now carried by bills pending in Congress on railroad control are finally approved.

I may say here that the bill before us has increased to some extent the guarantee proposed by the railway companies as compared with the bill which was originally introduced.

Atchison—

Meaning the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. In regard to that statement, I presume the Senator refers only to the increment between June 30, 1917, and December 28, 1917.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is to that part to which I refer, and I am not criticizing that part of it either.

Mr. WATSON. No, I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. But nevertheless it is a fact that the compensation has been increased since the bill was introduced.

The Atchison is dignified and distinguished by two large stars, which declares that its earnings upon stock as guaranteed by this bill will be 12 per cent. The Baltimore & Ohio has also two stars after its name, and it is said that the guaranteed earnings will be 7 per cent; the Chicago & North Western, also designated by two stars, earnings 10 per cent. This is of course upon capital stock. The Chesapeake & Ohio, 8 per cent; the Delaware & Hudson, 11 per cent; Great Northern, preferred, 10 per cent; Illinois Central, 11 per cent; Louisville & Nashville, 15 per cent; Norfolk & Western, 14 per cent; New York Central, 11 per cent; Northern Pacific, 10 per cent; Reading, 9 per cent; Southern Pacific, 11 per cent; Union Pacific, 14 per cent. There are others of less consequence which I need not read.

Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Minnesota that estimates of the character I have just read are either immaterial or unimportant. There are no shrewder——

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in just a moment. There are no shrewder or more intelligent observers in the country than those who are engaged in the business of buying and selling railway stocks, and when it is known that Wall Street looks upon this bill from the standpoint I have just indicated we may be very sure that the country at large will view it in practically the same way. I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, as illustrating what seems to me to be the utter unreliability of such a statement, gotten up by stock brokers who may be actuated by a purpose to bull a certain line of stock, I should like to call to the Senator's attention something that came under my observation, I think it was last year. I used to curiously follow some of these estimates and see how they panned out. I recall that one railroad was for weeks listed in such a circular as earning 8 per cent on its stock. I observed when the actual report got out that the railroad was earning 1 per cent. The experts in that case were about 7 per cent off.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Delaware is very unfortunate. I suppose he was easily misled. I said a moment ago I intended to prove that these statements were correct by the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and while in some instances there is a slight variation, in some instances they are a little too high and in some instances they are too low. I instance it only to show that upon the basis that we are preparing for this country those who are to deal in these stocks in the future understand what we are doing for the railway companies. I have not as yet come to that part of my argument in which I shall attempt to analyze whether we ought to pay them 10, 12, 15, or 20 per cent or not. I will come to that a little later on, but I am trying to hammer in, if I can, and if it can not be hammered in before an uninterested Senate it will be hammered in before an interested country, that in time of war, in time of dire distress, in a time when every man must give to his country all he has and all he is, when unselfishness ought to prevail, we are proposing to give to the railway corporations of this country a reward upon their capital stock never before dreamed of in the avarice of public utility capital.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] said, and said correctly, that this bill does not require the President to make an agreement with each railroad employing the standard which we authorize. Technically, Senators, that is true. Practically, it is a direction to the President to make agreements with these railway companies upon the basis which we are here establishing.

We all know the atmosphere which surrounds the whole subject at this time. We are told that the railway stocks and the railway bonds must be strengthened and fortified in the markets of the country. We are told that the confidence of the people in their soundness must be increased and deepened. We are told that if the railway companies were compelled to resort to legal proceedings in order to ascertain the just compensation for the use of the property the financial and commercial fabric of the country would totter and fall, and we were told before the committee in substance that if we did not enter into contracts of this character with the railroad companies they would resort to legal procedings; that the only way in which we could secure the cooperation of the railway companies of the country was to establish the standard that is proposed in this bill. I have no doubt, although I do not know, of course, that they have communicated the same purpose to the President and to the Director General. Personally, I do not accept their statements in that regard. Personally, I believe that if we would offer to them fair and just compensation, so that they must endure some of the consequences of the war and incur some of the perils and the hazards of the greatest disaster that ever fell upon mankind, they would accept it as loyal citizens, convinced that a lesser compensation than the bill proposes is, under the circumstances, fair and just. But whether they would or no affects me not at all. I desire to offer to them and pay to them a compensation that will be the full measure of the Constitution, the full measure of equity and justice and fairness as between the people who are to pay the money and the people who are to receive it; and when such an offer is made I believe that the railway companies will accept it. But they will take, of course, all they can get. That is one of the attributes of human nature, and we must not expect any other attitude on their part.

Recurring to the suggestion that this is but an authority to the President not to exceed a compensation ascertained in the manner described in section 1 of the bill, I desire to show, if I can, what the President's view is about it. I have no disposition whatever to conceal the authorship of this part of the bill. As reluctant as I am to differ from the President in this respect, my duty compels me to differ and I desire that Senators shall know that the President has become convinced that this is the proper standard of compensation. In his proclamation through which he assumed the possession and control of the properties he said—this is dated December 26, 1917—

The director shall, as soon as may be after assuming such possession and control, enter upon negotiations with the several companies looking to agreements for just and reasonable compensation for the possession, use, and control of their respective properties on the basis of an annual guaranteed compensation above accruing depreciation and the maintenance of their properties, equivalent, as nearly as may be, to the average of the net operating income thereof for the three-year period ending June 30, 1917; the results of such negotiations to be reported to me for such action as may be appropriate and lawful.

In the statement of the President which accompanied the proclamation he said:

Immediately upon the reassembling of Congress I shall recommend that these definite guarantees be given: First, of course, that the railway properties will be maintained during the period of Federal control in as good repair and as good equipment as when taken over by the Government; and, second, that the roads shall receive a net operating income equal in each case to the average net income of the three years preceding June 30, 1917.

In his message to Congress which followed shortly thereafter the President repeated this view and explicitly recommended that he be given authority to agree with the several railway companies so that each of them will receive an income ascertained according to the standard described both in the proclamation and the statement.

With this history of the development of the matter there can be no question with regard to the views of the President respecting compensation, and I assume that if the authority here expressed be granted he or the Director General will enter into agreements with these railway companies guaranteeing to them the net income which I have described. It is utterly impossible for him to differentiate between the railroad companies. It would take as long for the President to ascertain what is just compensation for each of these properties as it will require the Interstate Commerce Commission to do the like thing. We all know that when this bill is passed, if it is passed in its present form, there will be a general offer to the railway companies of an agreement to pay the sums of money ascertained in the manner set forth in the first section of the bill, and some of the railway companies will accept the offer, and that will constitute the agreement between them and the Government.

Mr. President, it is not agreeable or pleasant for me to differ from the President in this or any other matter. I understand the weight of the burden which he is bearing. I can appreciate the responsibilities which now rest upon him, and the Lord knows that I have no other purpose in my heart than to be of the utmost assistance to him in the cruelest hour through which mortal man ever lived. But it seems to me that I can best help him to bear his responsibilities by bearing my own.

This is not an Executive function. This is a legislative question originally, and the man who blindly follows the recommendation of the President, granting to him all the deference that we can pay and ought to pay to our leader in this great conflict, and repudiates his own sense of justice upon a question which is not for the President to decide but for us to determine, is not only false to his duty to the people of this country, but he is shrinking from a responsibility that his oath imposes upon him.

Whenever the President in a matter which pertains to the military movements and the military preparation of the United States in order to successfully carry on the war puts his judgment before me I shall follow it, unless I am so clearly convinced of its unsoundness as to make it impossible to accept it. It is not only my desire, but it is my highest pleasure to do so. But with regard to the compensation which shall be paid for these properties, of which he is already in possession and which he is already operating, and of which he will continue to hold possession and continue to operate, my judgment can not be influenced by his. The compensation has no reference to the prosecution of the war. Whether we give the railway companies a billion dollars in round numbers, which is here proposed, annually for the use of their property, or whether we give them $750,000,000 or $800,000,000 annually, as I propose, can not in the slightest degree affect the strength of the United States in the war.

If I believed that the President knew more about the subject than the Members of the Senate know I might feel differently. But here are Senators who have given a score of years or more to the study of these economic problems, and it is no reflection upon the President or upon the Director General to declare that the Senate knows more about adequate compensation for the use of the railroad properties of this country than either of them can know. There is no disloyalty to the President in considering this subject from an independent standpoint, and I, at least, must so view it.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] in opening this discussion indicated that those of us who felt that the compensation proposed in the bill was excessive were endeavoring to introduce some new or untried theory in public affairs. Mr. President, I can not so look upon it. The only new, untried thing is the standard of compensation proposed in the bill. Never before in the history of economics has a suggestion of that kind been made with regard to public utility property. I modify that statement because that is the basis upon which Great Britain is operating and rewarding her railroad properties.

I might just as well turn for a moment to Great Britain, although I shall deal with it more in detail later, in order that we may know what Great Britain did and what her action accomplished for her railway property. The day after the war Great Britain took over the possession of her railroad property. There was no agreement made at that time between the Government of Great Britain and the railroads of Great Britain. No one suggested making any agreement between the public and these railway companies.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to inquire whether the action of Great Britain was not based upon a preexisting statute?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was based upon the statute of 1871. I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if his statement does not cover the time previous to the taking over, and if shortly after the taking over they did not arrive at an agreement as a basis of compensation?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; as I understand the record made there, and as it was introduced before our committee, the consent of the railway companies of Great Britain with regard to compensation was not asked. The act of 1871 under which the Government took possession of the railroads in 1914 was not substantially different from our act of 1916, and made no provision for compensation other than the general statement that when the power exercised under it did take place the compensation was to be made. When on the 4th day of August, I believe, 1914, the council in Great Britain determined it was necessary to take over the railroads and they were taken over, the operating body, the directors appointed by the law, and who were in existence at the time they were taken over, simply published a statement that for the week following—and I want to mark that because it is one of the things that we will presently have to consider in this bill—for one week the Government would take over the railroads of the country and would pay or guarantee the net income for 1913; that is, guarantee the net income that was earned in 1913 with some modifications that were to be made by a consideration of the earnings for the first six or seven months of 1914.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would like to ask the Senator from Iowa if the reason of that was not because under the law they could not be taken over except for one week at a time?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not complaining because our Government did not take them over for one week at a time.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator's statement was that the Government of Great Britain only made the guarantee from week to week.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all.

Mr. KELLOGG. It was because they could not take the railroads over except from week to week.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely, and we would be a great deal better off if we could only guarantee an income for one week, because then we would be at liberty to pay the compensation from time to time in accordance with changed conditions. But we propose to authorize the President to enter into an agreement that may extend for 10 years.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just made a statement that in his judgment it would be better to have taken over these roads from week to week.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, I did not intend to say that if I did say it.

Mr. POMERENE. I certainly understood the Senator to say it would be much better to take them over from week to week. If the Senator did not make such a statement——

Mr. CUMMINS. What I said, or meant, was that it would be better if the compensation was determined from week to week.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the difference?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a great difference.

Mr. POMERENE. There would be 52 times as many controversies to settle as there would be by determining it in advance.

Mr. CUMMINS. That might be a great advantage. If the first agreement pays $200,000,000 more than ought to be paid it would be quite advantageous to make another.

Mr. POMERENE. That is an assumption without a statement of fact, in my judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not answer for the judgment of the Senator from Ohio. It is my judgment that it does.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that. The Senator now makes a statement that it is $200,000,000 too high. In his statement submitted here it is stated that it is $175,000,000 too high. I do not refer to this in a critical way, but I do mean to infer from the statement I have made that it is physically impossible for any Senator, or anybody, on the information we have now, to determine to a farthing what would be fair compensation.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio, I think, is not quite fair in that statement. I agree that it is a matter of judgment within fair limits respecting compensation, but if I were to propose that the railroads of the country should be paid only $100,000,000 a year I think no one would question that the compensation would be inadequate. If the Senator from Ohio would propose that the compensation should be $2,000,000,000 per year I think most people would assert that it is excessive. So we can reach limits beyond which, or under which, the common judgment of mankind repudiates the proposal.

Mr. POMERENE. Even though I think that the Senator from Iowa is extreme in his view—and he perhaps will think I am after I shall have made my statement—I am quite sure that he would never suggest making the compensation $100,000,000; neither would I make the compensation $2,000,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. And what the Senator from Ohio has just said is the very pith of this whole argument. I think it is plain that the compensation of $965,000,000 in the aggregate is obviously shocking and excessive. I believe that nine men out of ten will so believe. When I say in my minority report that the compensation is $175,000,000 more than it should be, I recognize that there may be a variation of five or eight or ten or twenty million dollars among men who look at the subject from the standpoint that I occupy. The compensation can not be reduced to an absolute mathematical accuracy, especially with the information which we now have.

But I proceed with Great Britain, because great strength is given to this bill by the assertion continually made that we are simply following the practice of Great Britain, and that we are not doing any more for our railway companies in this bill than Great Britain did for hers in the act of the council to which I have referred. I repeat that Great Britain is not bound for more than one week at a time by the standard of compensation which she has created; she is at liberty to revise, modify, or amend it whensoever she pleases. But that is not the principal thought in my mind.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, just a moment, if it will not interrupt the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that there was an agreement between the Government of Great Britain and the railroads that were taken over that they were to receive a standard return, equivalent to their average annual return of 1913, less a certain bonus paid to labor?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember that there was any agreement. There was a general assent to and acceptance of the order of the British Government, and there was an agreement subsequently with regard to certain bonuses that grew out of an advance in the wages of the men employed. The increased wages were assumed by the Government in lieu of the elimination of the modifications in the original order concerning the net earnings for the first seven months of the year 1914; but the efficacy—the binding effect—of the order of Great Britain, so far as compensation is concerned, does not depend upon the assent of the railways of Great Britain.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to call attention to a fact, and perhaps he can correct me if I am wrong. My impression is that the act of 1871, as subsequently modified by the act of 1888 and some other modifications of that act, made certain railroad officials a part of the military organization. The relation was such that they had certain titles or rank in regard to the service that they might assume in time of war, so that when war did occur the railroads, under the act looking toward the functions to be discharged by them, almost automatically went under Government operation without the legislation which we have necessarily to pass.

As was mentioned by the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. KELLOGG), they took the year 1913, and it was so stated in the report furnished our committee, as being the more prosperous, because 1914 up to the time when the war broke out, had shown a deficit in railroad earnings by virtue of the war. They took 1913 as the basis; they took the first six months, with the modification that the first six months of one year and the first six months of the other year should ultimately be the standard. They found that the first six months of 1914 showed a deficit, and that was abandoned. They then took the flat standard of 1913. Later on the Government assumed all the extra charge that came from the increase of the pay of the railroad employees; they took it off the railroads, and did not charge them with any of the extra pay which they granted to the employees, but still gave the roads their standard return of 1913.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from South Carolina is substantially correct, although I do not understand that the assumption on the part of the Government of the bonus given to the railway men had quite the basis which is stated by the Senator. The one was set off against the other. However that may be, it is not material to what I am attempting to put before the Senate.

Without any agreement on the part of the railroad companies—because, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, under the act of 1871 as followed by that of 1888, an act of subsequent years—there was created what was known as a railway executive committee. It was composed of the general managers of the principal railways of Great Britain. It was headed by the president of the Board of Trade, a Government body exercising a Government function. The very moment that the council issued the order for the possession of the property, the Board of Trade and the railway executive committee had possession, not of a part, but of all the railways of the kingdom, with the exception of Ireland, and proceeded to operate those properties as employees of the Government and not of their respective corporations. They were all, and are all, officers in the army of Great Britain, holding appropriate rank and being directly and properly responsible to the Government for every act which they perform. The Government fixed the compensation that should be paid to those railways as the net earnings of 1913; that is, the Government guaranteed the net earnings of that year. Why? Because it believed that the net earnings of that year fairly represented the value of the use of the property; not because the net earnings of any public utility property furnishes a standard for the value of that property, but because the amount which the Government would guarantee under that standard was believed by the officers of Great Britain to be fair and just compensation for the property so taken over.

What did it do for the owners of the railway properties of Great Britain? That is the point universally ignored in citing the action of Great Britain as a precedent for the standard announced in this bill. What did this guarantee do for the bondholders and the stockholders of the British railroads? The argument has been conspicuously silent with regard to that subject up to this time; but let me now suggest that the guarantee given or announced by Great Britain for the English railways paid the interest upon the bonds of those railways and less than 3½ per cent upon the stock of the railway companies. Great Britain is now paying, on an average, 4 per cent upon the railway bonds and 3¼ per cent upon the railway stock.

Mr. President, if it had been proposed to do that for the railways of the United States, my voice at least would not have been lifted up in protest against the bill. I am willing to pay those railways of the United States which my amendment covers 25 per cent more, aye 40 per cent more, upon their stock than the British Government has guaranteed to pay or now pays upon the British railways' stock. How idle it is to hold up Great Britain as the example which we ought to follow at this moment and to conceal the fact that Great Britain is paying her railway stockholders less than one-third what it is proposed by this bill to pay to American railway stockholders.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. If it is not in the order that the Senator intends to discuss the matter, I hope he will say so, and pretermit the answer that I should like until he reaches the particular point in his argument; but the point I had in mind was this: We have in this country, in the State constitutions and in the National Constitution, a provision that private property may not be taken for public use except just compensation shall be made. The Government, it seems to me, may not take my house or the Senator's store or any property that he has, personal or real, for war purposes or for any governmental purpose without paying just compensation. In ascertaining what would be just compensation, the courts have laid down very precise rules, and the value of the use may be very readily determined. Does the Senator differentiate between the public utilities corporation and private property? If the Government, as I have said, takes the Senator's store or property for war purposes it makes compensation for it, and that compensation is determined by the value of the use. If the Government only takes it temporarily and uses it, it pays the value of that use as just compensation. If the Government takes a railroad in which the Senator is interested, takes the use of it during the period of the war, is a different rule to be applied in determining the value there than would be applied in determining the value of the use of the property owned by private individuals? If not, then does it not come down to the proposition that the Senator is arguing, that, if the Government takes the use of public utilities property, a different standard is to apply in the courts in determining the value than if the Government takes the property of private individuals or the use of it during the period of the war?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly, as is recognized by all the courts, I think. The Constitution applies to public utility property just as fully and completely as it does to private property. We can no more deprive a railway company of the use of its property without making just compensation for it, than we can deprive the owner of purely private property of its use without making just compensation for it, but when we come to determine what just compensation is for the use of public property—public in the sense that it is devoted to a public use—a very different rule applies than is invoked for the determination of the same question with regard to private property.

I did not intend to deal with this question at this time, but I am quite willing to divert myself a moment to answer it. When one invests his money in a public enterprise, such as the creation of a public highway for the purpose of furnishing to the people of the country transportation facilities, he agrees that he will exact no more for the service rendered than a fair return upon his investment—some people say upon the value of the property which he creates—but, if the principle is carried out to its end, the two statements are the equivalent of each other. He agrees that he will not make a fortune out of the use of the property; that he will be content with a fair and reasonable return. When one invests money in a purely private enterprise, he makes no such agreement; he is at liberty to make all the profit which he can make without any restriction whatsoever; and in estimating the value of the use of his property, or in estimating the value of the property itself, if it be taken, then the court must take into account his privilege of making unlimited profit out of the property if the property is adapted to the acquisition of such profit. It is not so with public property, and the sooner we reach a sound conclusion on that very vital and important inquiry, the sooner we will be able fully to appreciate our duty respecting this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Can the Senator inform the Senate how the yield to the British railways, under the Government guarantee of 3½ and 4 per cent as I understood the Senator to say, compares with the yield to the same stockholders for the year prior, say to the assumption of control by the Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. My recollection is that the year 1913 was a comparatively good year for the British railways, and that the guarantee of the net earnings for that year gives to the stockholders of the British railways all that they were getting before, and possibly more.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The point I should like to have enlightenment upon, if the Senator can give me light upon it, is as to whether the British Government gave to the railways a guarantee such as to reduce to the security holders their yield from their securities, or did the British Government see to it by the guarantee that they should get the same return they had been receiving during the prior year?

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator mean the securities or stocks?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Stocks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have said that the Government would pay, or supply if there was a deficiency, the net earnings of the railways as shown in their operations for the year 1913.

Mr. WOLCOTT. By which the stockholder would get the same yield that he had been getting. Now, if that be true, would not this be the parallel in this country—that our Government should give a guarantee to the railroads of a sum sufficient to enable the railroads in this country to pay to their stockholders the same amount of return they had been receiving during prior years?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it would be parallel, because the returns in this country might be excessive; they were not excessive in Great Britain; but, so far as I am personally concerned, I am very, very willing that the Government shall guarantee the interest upon all the bonds and guarantee all the dividends that have been customarily paid in the past. That, however, is not the question in issue; the question is, whether the Government shall guarantee the interest upon all their bonds and nearly twice the dividends that have heretofore been paid?

Now, I do not want there to be any misunderstanding upon that point. The railroads in Great Britain have followed what I regard as the honest and just course in railway operation, namely, they do not collect from the people who employ their service more than is necessary to pay interest upon their bonds and dividends upon their stock, and a very small dividend, too, and some of them do not get that much. Our railroads charge the people of this country enough to pay interest upon their bonds, dividends upon their stock, and enough to build their railroads besides. That is the difference between the English custom or practice and the American custom.

During the year 1913 the net earnings of the English railways did not result in an excess or surplus after paying interest and dividends of more than, if I remember it, one-tenth of 1 per cent. It would delight me if the Senate would accept with regard to surplus the outcome of the English plan. I have offered, and will presently explain, an amendment which affects 86 roads in the United States, embracing a little more than half the railway mileage, roads which move about 75 or 80 per cent of the traffic, which will reduce the guarantee proposed in the bill, as nearly as can be estimated, $183,000,000 per year, and yet pay all the interest upon all the bonds issued by these companies and pay, as well, their habitual customary dividends upon the stock, varying from 5 per cent to 10 per cent.

I do not want any one to get the impression that I desire to reduce this compensation with regard to dividend-paying roads below the point that will enable them to maintain their securities in full and complete strength and give them a standing in the markets of the country that will command the utmost confidence. I am complaining about the surplus which we are guaranteeing for the railroads in the United States. Great Britain did not guarantee any surplus; the English railroads have never collected any surplus, and, in my judgment, railways ought not to collect a surplus from their rates for transportation, except a surplus that will tide them over a lean year now and then.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him further?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am trying to get at the basis of the Senator's reasoning. I understand that he is perfectly willing to allow the railroads enough of a yield to pay the interest on their fixed securities—bonds—and a dividend equivalent——

Mr. CUMMINS. Equivalent to the dividend that they have been regularly paying.

Mr. WOLCOTT. A dividend equivalent to that which they have been regularly paying in the past. Now, does the Senator think it is a legitimate item to allow the railroads a sort of surplus account to take care of depreciation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware must be aware that depreciation is taken care of before net income is reached at all.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is by the Government, the Senator means?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, by the railroads. The railroads charge off, and have the right to charge off, every year a certain depreciation of their property, and for many years they have done it under rules that have been promulgated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This depreciation becomes a part of the expense of operation and maintenance, and is taken care of before they reach net income. Of course, the Government will take care of depreciation. This bill provides that the Government must return these properties to the railroad companies in as good condition as they were when taken, and the Government must maintain them, and must charge off annually a suitable and adequate sum for depreciation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that. I am not at all familiar with the allowances made to the roads by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Do I understand from the Senator that the Interstate Commerce Commission in the accounts filed with the commission allows the railroads credit for current depreciation? Has that been the practice?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. The railroads are not at all agreed about the amount; and the Interstate Commerce Commission does not prescribe a fixed rule as to the percentages, but each railroad not only has the right to charge off the current depreciation of its property, but it is its duty to do so, a duty that is enforced upon them by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The charges for depreciation in the accounts vary from 1 per cent to 6 per cent each year. But, however that may be, the depreciation is fully protected in the operating expenses of the railroads, as I shall presently show.

At this time I am only concerned in leaving the proper impression with regard to the British treatment of railways. There is a great system—small compared with ours, of course, but doing an immense business—I think comprising more than 20,000 miles of single track, with a far greater percentage of double track, triple track, and quadruple track than we have in our country; a great system, serving one of the most energetic and successful countries in the world. When Great Britain takes that system, it simply says: "We will guarantee you enough to pay you the interest upon your bonds," which is about one-half per cent less in Europe than the average interest upon American railway bonds, "and enough to pay an average of 3½ per cent upon the stocks that are outstanding." That is all that Great Britain has done in awarding just compensation for the use of that vast property.

Great Britain was conscious that all the people of that country must bear the burdens of the war in which she was engaged; and I am only endeavoring to fasten upon the minds of the Senate and the country the idea that when our Government takes possession of our railroads, in the midst of a world-destroying war, of the outcome of which no human being can be certain, we remove from this property all the peril, all the hazard of the war; we lift it up out of the chaos and the confusion and the fluctuations of all other business; we say to these companies: "No matter what may happen to other properties in the United States, no matter how values may decline, no matter how profits may disappear, no matter what sacrifice must be made in order to maintain the Union, we will see that you shall receive each year a certain income upon the value of your property."

The Government of this country has already asked the people to loan to it, I think, five billions of dollars; and between now and the 30th of June, as we were told, it is likely that it will ask our people to loan it the further incomprehensible sum of ten billions of dollars. It asks them to give, from what they have, these incalculable amounts and to receive from it a promise that at the end of the period named in the bond they will accept the principal, and in the meantime will accept 4 per cent per annum; and the people loyally and gladly are coming to the rescue of the Government and are furnishing it credit in a way unknown to any other period of the nation, and all they ask is 4 per cent. Yet in the midst of this loyal scene, in which the people of America are striving with each other in order to exhibit their loyalty and their desire to help in the time of stress and strain, in comes this bill, which declares that with a Government guarantee which makes the payment of the sum guaranteed as certain as the continuance of the Government itself, in the face of all these circumstances and perils and dangers, these same men who are staggering under the burden of loaning their Government money at 4 per cent shall guarantee to the stockholders of the railways of the United States from 10 to 20 per cent upon the par value of their securities. It is a monstrous proposal.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, I think in all fairness he ought to call attention to the fact that the Government took over these roads. They did not come in of their own volition. They would have had to bear the vicissitudes of the changing war conditions, and were bearing them until the Government, of its own volition, took them. The Government is now just proposing to give them what was the result of the vicissitudes up to the time that it took them.

The railroads, as I say, did not come in of their own volition. We took them over, and under the due process of law the committee attempted to find out what they had been earning under the very vicissitudes that the Senator remarks upon.

The Government might take over a horse that belonged to me that was worth, say, $200. It can not foretell what that horse may be worth to-morrow. It may die, but the Government must pay me according to the value of it at the time the Government took control. The record from the Interstate Commerce Commission shows that what we are allowing the railroads out of their earnings is what they were earning when we took them, not when they volunteered to come and asked us to take them, and demanded this as a recompense.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to say a word in response to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was just going to suggest that I take it the Senator from Iowa is not going to finish his speech to-night, and as he has been talking a long while, and evidently is somewhat weary, we might take an adjournment now. It is approaching the hour of 5.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded the floor for the day.]

Saturday, February 16, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, so much time has elapsed since I suspended my argument upon the measure under consideration that I may be permitted to restate very briefly the subject under discussion. I am considering the first section of the bill reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee. It gives to the President the authority to enter into agreements with the various railway companies of the country for the compensation which they are to receive during Federal control for the use of their properties. The compensation mentioned in the section, and which the President is authorized to agree to pay, is the average net operating income of these companies during the three years ending June 30, 1917.

I had mentioned the fact that the President had reached the conclusion, evidently long before this legislation came before Congress, that the standard which I have mentioned, and which is found in the section, is the proper standard of compensation. He so declared in the proclamation under which the Government assumed possession and control of the properties; he reiterated it in the statement which accompanied the proclamation; and he again expressed it in his message to Congress immediately after the holiday recess. We have a right, therefore, to assume that, if the authority specified in section 1 is conferred upon the President, he will enter into agreements with these companies upon the basis I have suggested. Moreover, the Director General in his appearance before the committee argued at very considerable length for the standard that is here set up. I am not suggesting this in a critical way; I am mentioning it only to make it absolutely sure that, if we do give the President the authority to enter into these contracts of the character which section 1 prescribes, he will exercise the authority, for his conclusion upon that subject is now fixed and, I believe, unalterable.

I think the compensation recommended by the President—and I say it with all the deference in the world to him—is excessive. I think it introduces into governmental railway operation the same abominable profiteering which disfigures other fields of governmental activity. There is one thing that the people of this country will not endure. Loyal, as they are, enthusiastic, as they are, determined, as they are, to carry on the war to a successful end, they will not tolerate the general practice of creating fortunes out of the war. There is such universal indignation against the practice that I need but mention it in order to command the assent of every Senator and every citizen of the Republic. If we want a united, determined, aggressive citizenship, we must take care that the burdens of the war are fairly and equitably distributed and that those who have the power to profiteer shall not be given the opportunity to satisfy their cupidity and their avarice. I want Senators to remember that it is just as important to secure the cooperation of the great body of the people, as it is to strengthen and fortify the railway securities. I think I do not disparage or depreciate or diminish the value or importance of the latter, but the former must be borne in mind in the consideration of every question which distributes money, collected from the people, among those who may render service to the Government.

Do not imagine that I have any prejudice against the railway companies. I am a law-abiding man; I believe in order and regularity. I am still clinging to the Constitution amidst the waves of war. I have not yet given up that ark of safety for the American Republic. It would have commanded my instant assent if this bill had provided that the value of the use of the various railroad properties of which the Government takes possession should be ascertained by an impartial tribunal, preferably the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has at its command, and has now in its records, a very large part of the information necessary speedily to arrive at a just result. I would have been glad if from the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or any other impartial tribunal, there could have been a proper appeal to the courts, in order that the judiciary of the land might utter the last word upon this vital subject; and with the judgment so determined I would have been absolutely content. I would have been glad also if in the meanwhile the President could have been given the power to advance to the railway companies whatever may become necessary to enable them to properly protect their securities; and finally, whatever balance there may be, whether in favor of the Government or in favor of the railways, could be fairly adjusted. This would have been a just, orderly way in which to have ascertained the value of these properties and to have secured a judgment with regard to the value of the use of these properties.

Every citizen of the land would have been content if that proceeding had been adopted. We have just that proceeding here, but we have it accompanied with an authority to the President to enter into agreements with these companies, agreements which shall take the place of and be a substitute for the proceedings which arrive in a legal way at the result we are seeking; and I want you to bear in mind all the time that it is only with respect to the authority that we are proposing to give to the President that I have any question. I assert that the standard that we are erecting here for him furnishes to these companies, or some of them, an excessive compensation, and that if we make contracts of this character we will be subject to all the criticism that is now poured out upon the profiteering which has been so prevalent in many activities of the Government.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I am asking purely for information, because I believe my colleague probably knows more about this subject than any other man in Congress.

This standard that we give to the President leaves it with the President, as I understand, to determine whether or not he shall do this, whether or not he shall come to this standard; or, if he can come to an agreement with the railroads to pay less, he then can do it; can he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. He has the power to do it, the legal authority to do it; but he has stated that this is the compensation which he thinks ought to be given to these companies.

Mr. KENYON. That is, in his address to Congress? Is that the statement of the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. In the proclamation, in the statement which accompanied it, in the message which he delivered to Congress after the holidays, and through the Director General in his testimony before the committee.

Mr. KENYON. That is the question that has been troubling me—whether we are authorized to assume that the President will grant this compensation which the Senator thinks is excessive; and I agree with him in that. The President, of course, may change his mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. At least it would be safer not to invest him with the authority, if we are clearly of the opinion that it does provide for an excessive compensation. At least, so I view it.

Mr. KENYON. And yet, if the President should become convinced that the compensation was excessive, he could of course change his mind and not reach the high standard which the bill allows him to reach.

Mr. CUMMINS. He has the abstract authority to reduce the compensation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to say to the Senator, if he will permit me to interrupt him, that while the President did recommend in his message and the Director General testified that he thought this the proper standard, it was all in the light of its being a maximum; and I am informed by the men who will execute it, who appeared before the committee, that it is simply a maximum, and that the President expects, with his advisors, to treat it as such, and, in cases where the maximum would be too much, not to grant it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not in the confidence of the advisors of the President or the Director General. I do not know what they intend to do; but so far as I am concerned I do not intend to give the President the power to do wrong if I can prevent it. I do not intend to give the Director General the authority to pay more than ought to be paid if my vote and my voice can prevent the granting of that authority. I can not understand how any Senator can satisfy his conscience, if he believes the standard is wrong and ought to be reduced, by conferring the authority upon the President in the hope that he will not exercise the power that is given to him.

As I said in the very beginning, I have no desire to interfere with the responsibilities of the President. He must bear them. They are heavy, onerous, and he has my sympathy every moment of the day, and will have my assistance upon every occasion. But I can help him best by bearing my own responsibilities, and so can you; and if you believe that this standard is excessive, then it is your duty to limit his authority within the fair bounds of reasonableness.

Let another thing be understood: The amendment which I shall offer to the first section, and which I am really discussing as I move forward with the proposition itself, is applicable to 140,000 miles of single-track railway. It is applicable to a little more than one-half of the railway mileage of the country; but within that one-half are the great monopolistic systems which have in the past oppressed, through excessive rates, the people of the country, and have accumulated more than under any fair adjustment of rates they should be permitted to accumulate. There are 110,000 miles of the 250,000 miles in the country to which my amendment does not apply at all, and I pause here to say that in my judgment the standard of the bill not only does not give to those railroads an excessive compensation, but I believe that in some cases it will give them less than just compensation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. My understanding—and I should like to have the Senator correct me if I am wrong—is that in those cases of which the Senator is speaking now, where the President believes that the basis of payment would not bring a sufficient return, he has power to increase it; has he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. The two classes are not entirely the same. That is, the paragraph to which the Senator refers says that as to any nondividend-paying carriers he may do whatever he pleases; but there are some roads that pay small dividends, and that would be included within the 110,000 miles which I mentioned a moment ago that would not be included within the paragraph which the Senator has before him.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator include in those 110,000 miles the nondividend-paying carriers?

Mr. CUMMINS. All of them.

Mr. NORRIS. All of them?

Mr. CUMMINS. They are all included.

Mr. NORRIS. As to those, at least, the President has authority to make an agreement that would give them a reasonable and fair rate?

Mr. CUMMINS. He has.

Mr. NORRIS Under the bill as it stands now, if they did not get any dividends in those three years, he can pay them what he thinks is a fair return?

Mr. CUMMINS. They are not exactly the same. I pick out of all the mileage of the country those roads and those systems whose net income, as compared with stock capitalization, is more than 5 per cent, and apply the standard of my amendment to them and no others; so that the amendment which I will propose, if adopted, will not change the bill in any respect in so far as concerns the 110,000 miles of railway which represent in a broad way the weaker and the poorer lines.

With that statement, I now ask the attention of the Senate to the proof which I said in the beginning I would produce. But before I do that, Mr. President, I desire to print as part of my remarks and at the proper place a table concerning the net earnings of the English railways which was introduced before the committee, and about which I spoke day before yesterday when I was discussing this question. It is found on Part V of the hearings, on page 965. It shows, with regard to nearly all the British railways, the net earnings for the year 1913. In other words, it shows the return which Great Britain has guaranteed to her railways; and I only repeat that her guarantee is substantially 4 per cent upon the bonded indebtedness of the railways, and 3½ per cent upon the stock of the railways. That is the standard which Great Britain thought it was fair to use in the compensation of her railways; and I say again that I am not only willing to go as far as Great Britain did in compensation, but I am willing to double the amount awarded by Great Britain to the shareholders.

There being no objection, the table above referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, in referring to the bonded indebtedness of the British railroads, says that the British Government has guaranteed practically 4 per cent. Does he mean that they have fixed in the guaranty a definite per cent——

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. Or does he mean that they are paying whatever interest those bonds bear, and that that amounts to practically 4 per cent?

Mr. CUMMINS. The latter is what I mean. The 4 per cent is an average of the interest.

Mr. NORRIS. The guaranty provides for the interest on the bonds, whatever it may be according to the terms of the bonds?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the English agreement was to guarantee the net earnings of the year 1913, the year before the war. The net earnings did pay 4 per cent upon the bonds and 3½ per cent in substance upon the stock, and that is the amount which Great Britain pays.

Mr. NORRIS. Do not the bonds bear a specific amount on their face?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. Some of them bear 3½ per cent interest, some of them 4½, but the average is about 4.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did I understand the page referred to by the Senator to be page 965 of volume 5 of the RECORD?

Mr. CUMMINS. Some one has taken that volume from my desk.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well. That shows that the rate of return was 4.4 per cent, and that the dividend that they paid on their stocks the previous year was 3.91 per cent, if that is the table to which the Senator refers.

Mr. CUMMINS. The table shows what it shows. My statement with regard to the aggregate guarantee is derived from the testimony of Mr. Julius Kruttschnitt as well as the testimony of Clifford Thorne, both of whom have computed the returns that were made under the English guaranty.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me at this juncture just to read a brief statement taken from the British report and printed in a memorandum submitted to the Committee on Interstate Commerce relative to the Government control of railroads in Great Britain in its financial aspect with relation to the railway employees? It was prepared by the Legislative Reference Division of the Library of Congress, and printed for the use of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is just a few lines which, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to read, right on this point.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It says:

1913 a "banner year." The general opinion in railway, engineering, and investing circles at the time the terms of compensation were announced was, that "the Government has been generous." The year 1913 had been a "banner year," marking "the high level of prosperity" of the British railways since the beginning of the century. The average dividend rate upon the total ordinary capital (excluding nominal additions), whether or not ranking for dividend, had been higher in 1913 than for many years previous. The Investors' Review has declared that "as 1913 was a very good year, taken all around, the shareholders have not much to grumble about." The Scottish railways responded at once to the new situation which the agreement brought about, by making the dividend announcements which, because of the uncertainty due to the war and to the assumption of control by the government, had been postponed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was stating a fact, not endeavoring to explain it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point I was making was that the railroads have postponed any dividends on their stock and after they made the agreement with the Government they immediately resumed payment of dividends on their stock.

Mr. CUMMINS. That fact is entirely irrelevant and immaterial to the point I am making. I am trying to show what Great Britain did for her railways, which was a guarantee of net earnings for the year 1913, and I have endeavored to point out what those net earnings were in order to show what return upon capital Great Britain allowed to the bondholders and the shareholders of her railways.

I ask the Senate now to look with me for a moment upon what the proposed guarantee will do, if it were accepted by all the railroads. I do not know that it will be accepted by all the railroads. I think it is more than likely that some of the weaker railroads will insist upon their reward in legal proceedings, but I am very sure that all the great systems of railways in the United States will eagerly accept the offer. But let us assume now that they will all accept the offer of a guaranteed operating income, the average of the three years just passed.

According to the terminology of the reports required by the Interstate Commerce Commission the net operating income of a railroad is the sum which remains of operating earnings after deducting the expenses of operating, maintenance, taxes, and the like. A great many roads have other sources of income, and to those sources I will presently make some reference. They are outside of the present arrangement, and these roads will be possessed of these incomes in addition to the guaranteed sum which the Government proposes to pay.

The majority report says that the aggregate guarantee for all the railroads is $945,000,000. I say in frankness that that is a few million dollars, very few, however, more than I had estimated as the guaranteed amount of the average net income, but I will, as I ought, accept the view of the majority of the committee in that respect.

We undertake also to pay in addition to the $945,000,000 per year a fair per cent upon the increase in the value of the property between the 30th of June, 1917, and the 1st of January, 1918. This increase is estimated by the majority of the committee at from ten to fifteen million dollars. I will assume the lower of the two amounts. We then reach an aggregate guarantee—and if one road does not get it another one will—for all the railroads of the United States of $955,000,000 annually.

Let us see what that will do for the capitalization of all the railroads of the United States. As shown by the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission filed in the hearings the par value June 30, 1917, of all railway bonds, eliminating duplications, was $10,021,730,075. Is there any dispute about that? If there is I should like to hear it made now.

There were outstanding on the 30th of June, 1917, $10,021,730,075. The people who hold these bonds have agreed with the railway companies with regard to the returns upon their part of the capital or capitalization. No matter what we do, the bondholders who own this vast sum in securities will neither receive more nor less. Their return is fixed by agreement.

Mr. President, the annual interest charge upon the bonded debt of all the railroads in the United States for the year ending June 30, 1917, was in round numbers $400,000,000. As I remember it, as reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission, it was $405,000,000. There was some interest upon floating debt or unfunded debt which I need not mention at this time. It would make no difference in the results which I shall read.

Deducting $400,000,000 required to pay the interest upon all the bonds held by the public or eliminating duplications, all the railroads, considering them as one, would have at the end of the first year of this guarantee $550,000,000 available for their shareholders or their stockholders.

Now, do not let us misunderstand the meaning of that situation. I do not say that these railway companies would distribute $550,000,000 in dividends. They have not done that in the past and I have no reason to believe that they will do it in the future. But these companies will have of the Government guaranty $550,000,000 available for shareholders, money that can either be used for dividends, for an increase in the value of the property, or for the extinguishment of debt, or some other capital account. In any event, it inures to the benefit of the stockholders. It is their money and they can use it as they desire.

A very simple computation, the simplest in the world, shows what we are guaranteeing upon an average for all the railways in the United States, and I am treating them now as one company, remember. We are guaranteeing 8.5 per cent on all the stock of all the railroads in America, and that without taking into consideration the other sources of income which many of these companies have, and which will swell the power of the railway companies to return dividends to or construct property for their shareholders.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Where does the Senator get his figures for that statement?

Mr. CUMMINS. Which statement?

Mr. KELLOGG. That 8.50 per cent on all the stock not including the corporate income.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator must have noticed where I got it.

Mr. SMOOT (to Mr. CUMMINS). You did not give the aggregate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon; I think I omitted one element there, and then the Senator can make his inquiry. I have already shown the interest charge. I now come to the stock. The aggregate par value June 30, 1917, of the capital stock of all railroads, eliminating duplications and omitting some of the very small roads which do not report, was $6,314,570,554.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is a correct statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator say that is not correct?

Mr. KELLOGG. It is a correct statement of the amount of stock outstanding. But the experts of the commission furnished the figures which I quote, which show that the interest on bonds is $450,000,000 instead of $400,000,000, and that the total dividend, if all the income, both corporate and net operating income was applied to the stock, would be only 8.26 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. The statement is wrong, that is all, in my judgment; or if that statement is right then the Interstate Commerce Commission has made a different one to the committee. I do not pretend to reconcile all these figures. I say that the Interstate Commerce Commission filed with our committee a statement which showed that the interest paid upon all the bonds outstanding on the 30th day of June, 1917, was $405,000,000, and all we need to do is to recur to the report in order to verify what I have said.

I have not included in my computation the interest upon the unfunded debt, the current debt, nor do I think it ought to be included.

That is a varying sum paid from month to month, and the debt existing in one part of the year may be entirely discharged in another part of the year. The Senator from Minnesota will observe that I confine my statement to the interest upon the bonded debt, and upon this statement I reaffirm that the United States, if it gives this authority, is authorizing the guaranty of a sum that, aside from all other sources of income, will be the equivalent of 8.5 per cent upon all the stock of all the railroads——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Even if my figures were modified in the way suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, and I have had no opportunity, of course, to examine those figures because they were not put before the committee. They were evidently furnished recently and may be accurate, but I should like to have an opportunity to examine them, because there is nothing so deceptive as figures.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a difference of only one-quarter of 1 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. It makes so little difference anyhow that the disparity is a negligible matter. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be interesting if the Senator has the figures if he would tell us, in connection with the figures he has just given, how much revenue the railroads have derived in the same fiscal year from other sources.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not give that accurately because I have it combined with the net operating income in another connection.

Mr. NORRIS. Could the Senator give it approximately?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is something like fifty millions of dollars.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator desires it I will state that the statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission says that the total corporate income outside of net operating income amounts to $150,000,000, and the obligations for net rentals paid is $119,000,000.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, I am very glad to have the Senator from Minnesota answer the question, but I have not examined the table.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, it occurred to me when the Senator was giving the figures that he was omitting one item which would not apply to all roads, but to a great many roads, the amount of income from the sale of public lands, etc. I suppose it is not included.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. With some roads that would be quite a large item, so much so that it would have quite an effect upon the income.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will presently, when I come to consider the railroads which are affected by the amendment which I will propose, show precisely the combined income guaranteed by the Government, that is, the net operating income and the income from other sources, not separated but combined, in order that there may appear precisely what each of these companies will have at the end of each year of Federal control for the benefit of their stockholders. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was about to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the figures just submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] seem to be based entirely upon incomes derived from operating roads or leased roads. There is considerable income that is derived from other property than what might be denominated strictly railroad property, for instance, coal companies, hotels, a large quantity of real estate, and that would swell considerably the figures submitted by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly so. I have not examined the table, so I am not able to advise upon it.

Mr. President, no matter whether the percentage suggested by the Senator from Minnesota or the percentage which I have named is correct, either is intolerable. Either will inflict an injustice from which this country will never recover, because we are taking now a step which involves something more than the mere ascertainment and payment of just compensation for a limited period.

Mr. President, remember that more than one-half the capital stock was issued originally in defiance of both law and morals. Remember that more than one-half of it—and I am not now imagining, I am stating the result of investigation after investigation that has heretofore been carried on—more than one-half of the capital stock was issued without any consideration whatever paid to the railway corporation or corporations which issued it. I do not assert that the present holders of the railway stock have paid nothing for it; I do not know; but I do know that a large part of it is absolutely baseless, so far as consideration is concerned. And so we are proposing here to guarantee to all this great mass of inflated, watered capital stock an annual return of more than 8 per cent upon its face par value. It may be that action of that kind can be defended, but hitherto I have not heard anyone with sufficient temerity to undertake its defense.

Mr. SMOOT. Was that upon the par value or the market value?

Mr. CUMMINS. The 8.5 per cent is upon the par value. This showing, however, does not represent the full iniquity of the proposal. I have been considering now the effect of the guaranty upon the railway stock of all the railroads without discrimination as between them. I shall now separate these railroads into two classes. I intend now, after setting aside companies operating 110,000 miles of the railways of the country which I think this bill does not guarantee more than they should receive, to ask your attention to 86 systems of railway which represent 140,000 miles of single track, and which carry from 75 to 80 per cent of the traffic of the country, and I want you to consider what this guaranty will do for them, for I do not want to withdraw one single farthing from the proposed guaranty so far as the weaker and poorer railroads are concerned. I would add to the guaranty rather than diminish it, not in the aggregate, but as to particular properties.

I will at this point read the amendment which I had printed, because I think that in discussing what we are about to do for the railways covered by my amendment we ought to carry in our minds the change which the amendment suggests. The amendment is to be added after the word "included," on line 17, page 2, of Senate bill 3752, and reads as follows:

Provided, That the standard return to any such carrier whose average rate of net income to capital stock for the years aforesaid has been more than 5 per cent shall not exceed the net railway operating income for the calendar year 1917 after deducting therefrom the amount available out of earnings for investment and surplus: Provided further, That the last preceding limitation shall not be employed so as to reduce the net income (above all operating expenses, taxes, interest, and all other fixed charges) of any such carrier below the amount required to meet each year the regular dividend accruals on all capital stock outstanding December 31, 1917. The surplus over and above the standard return as so computed shall be paid into the revolving fund hereafter created, and such part thereof as may be necessary shall be used in additions, betterments, and extensions to said property. All of said property constructed out of, or purchased by the same, shall belong to, and shall be held in trust for, the public, and no return to any railway company shall ever be paid thereon.

If you will turn to the minority views which I submitted you will find on pages 7 and 8 a table which names the railways that will come within the amendment which I have proposed, and whose standard return will be affected by the amendment. These railway companies or systems are 86 in number and, as I have more than once said, they comprise about 140,000 miles of single-track railway. The table to which I have referred, the original of which I hold in my hand, was prepared by the Bureau of Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I accept it implicitly, for I believe that it states in each instance the exact truth.

Taking up the table, I call attention, first, to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. The proposed standard return, that is the return of the bill, the net operating income of the company for the three years which have been taken as the test, is $46,764,485. The average net income for the three years ended June 30, 1917, was $44,534,939.

The statement of those two sums of money requires me now if I can, to explain what these terms "net railway operating income" and "net income" mean, as they are employed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and as they are used in the reports made by the railroad companies. I do this because it would appear from the statement that the proposed standard return of net operating income is larger than the average net income for these years. It is larger because in the column of average net income for the three years ending June 30, 1917, the interest upon all debts has been deducted, whereas in the proposed standard return—that is, the average net railway operating income—the interest upon indebtedness has not been deducted. On the other hand, the income from other sources than mere railway operation has been carried into the item $44,534,939, and "net income" shows not only the net railway operating income but the net income from other sources, less the interest that has been paid both on bonds and the general indebtedness.

I think that it is worth while, Mr. President, at this point to explain just what these terms mean. I have before me the preliminary Abstract of Statistics of Common Carriers for the year ended June 30, 1916, which was issued by the Bureau of Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and is an official document. It is the last one of its kind that has been printed. I will take the Pennsylvania Railroad as an instance, in order that we may fully understand how these things are computed.

I pass the assets and liabilities, that is, the balance sheet, and come to the income account for the year. The first item in the income account for the year is $220,113,358. That represents the railway operating revenue. The next item is $155,278,979. That represents the railway operating expenses. That includes all the expenses of operation of every kind, maintenance of all kinds, all salaries from that of the president to that of the section hands, all wages, all supplies, everything that enters into the operation of the railway. That leaves a net revenue from railway operation of $64,834,379. There is then mentioned "Railway tax accruals." Those are the taxes for the year and the uncollectable railway revenue; and those two items are deducted from the net revenue, which leaves $57,460,639. That is the railway operating income of the Pennsylvania Railroad. There are certain adjustments of a minor character named in the bill that I need not mention. That is the railway operating income, and it is what remains of the operation revenue after the deduction of all expenses, including taxes.

Now, we come to quite a different aspect of the matter. We come, now, to what is known as nonoperating income and nonoperating expenses. Let us see what they are. I will not read the amounts attendant upon them. Omitting the three items which are taken in under this section, which do not really make very much difference in the outcome—and I will not pause to explain why they are taken in—the first item of credit in the nonoperating income is the income from lease of roads; the second is miscellaneous rent income; the third is nonoperating physical property; another is the dividend income; and that I desire to impress upon the minds of all Senators who are here. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. receives in dividends from other railroad companies, and possibly from other properties, too, $15,450,308. Then, income from funded securities, income from unfunded securities, and accounts, and all other nonoperating income.

Now, we come to the debit balance in nonoperating revenues. First, we have hire of freight cars, rent of locomotives, rent for other equipment, joint facility rent—these are taken into the bill as a part of the railway operating income; but they are so small, and they so nearly balance each other, that it makes no difference in the outcome—rent for leased roads. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. paid during the year covered by the figures $10,128,558 as rent for roads which it leased. Then, the miscellaneous tax accruals, separately operated properties, interest on funded debt, amounting to $11,763,357, and interest on unfunded debt, amounting to $262,487, all other income deductions, and so on.

Those two classes of items were balanced up, and they then were carried into the operating income which I have already described, and the outcome was that the net income of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for that year was $53,733,439. That was the amount that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. had for its shareholders; that was the amount that it could use in any way it saw fit for the benefit of the owners of the property and all the property that is included within their capitalization.

Now let us see how it used that money. In the first place, it paid $2,002,198 to sinking fund. That, of course, is to retire, I assume, some obligations in a certain time. That is a direct payment upon capital, of course, and is for the benefit of shareholders. Next, dividend appropriations of income. It paid $29,952,222 in dividends for that year. The third item is income appropriated for investment in physical property; that is to say, it took of its net income that belonged to its shareholders, $15,000,000 and more, and instead of dividing it as dividends among the stockholders it bought property for the stockholders or constructed property for the stockholders but it was none the less an earning for the shareholders. Then, the next item is miscellaneous appropriations of income, $2,267,414.

After paying the dividend of 6 per cent—for that is the dividend of the Pennsylvania—and after putting fifteen and a half million dollars in new property and after putting two and a quarter million dollars in some other kind of property, it still had remaining undistributed and undisposed of $3,996,260 as the result of the year's operation, and when it added that to the surplus which it had accumulated in former years it had at the end of the year, after all expenses and charges and interest and dividends, and after it had taken nearly $18,000,000 for the purchase of new property, it had with which to begin the year, a surplus of $29,541,830, being the accumulation of that year and of previous years.

I have gone carefully into this and somewhat in detail, and I know in a wearisome way, but I think it is due to the members of the Senate who care to acquaint themselves with the subject, who care anything about the enormous burden that we are assuming, to know what is meant by "railway operating income," and what is meant by "net income," and what the two combined will do for the stockholders, as well as for the bondholders of the railway companies.

With that explanation I take up again the table furnished me by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

If the guaranty which is proposed in this bill is given, the stock of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. will earn in each year of Federal control 8.92 per cent. In stating that I am assuming that the income of the property from other sources—that is, outside of the operating income—will be the same that it has been in the three years that are past.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator if that includes the interest on the bonded debt?

Mr. CUMMINS. The interest upon the bonded debt has all been taken out, as well as all other debts.

Mr. THOMAS. Then the eight and odd per cent is net?

Mr. CUMMINS. The 8.92 per cent is net—net to the stockholders.

Mr. THOMAS. After the payment of the bonded interest?

Mr. CUMMINS. After all expenses of operation, maintenance, depreciation, taxes, fixed charges and interest are paid; and that will be true of each one of these companies which I am about to name.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would that include the war taxes, too?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not include the war tax. I suppose the Senator from Utah has reference to the war tax of 1917.

Mr. KING. October, 1917.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not include that. We all have to bear our war taxes. Certainly I do not want to guarantee these companies against their war taxes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I correctly gather what the Senator has said, the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. under this proposed arrangement would net nearly 3 per cent more than they have been able to net under their unrestricted management in normal times?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, 2.7 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is hardly right, because the Pennsylvania Co. has been earning these amounts in the past.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but, notwithstanding all that, it is proposed by this bill to give them a sum in excess of what they would earn in ordinary, normal times; is it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is the proposal, if you qualify it by saying "ordinary, normal times." I am not asserting that we are proposing to give to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. more than it earned during the year 1916.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague [Mr. KING] asked the question as to whether this covered war taxes. I doubt very much whether there are more than two or three railroads in the United States that will have to pay war taxes under the present law. They do have to pay the increased surtax; but as far as the excess-profits tax is concerned, I think there are only two railroads in the United States that will pay any excess-profits tax. The Pennsylvania will not have to pay any.

Mr. STONE. The New York Central would.

Mr. SMOOT. The Union Pacific would.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Utah is probably right; but, however that may be, the taxes for the first half of the year 1917, whatever they may be under the act of 1917, are not deducted as expenses from the operating revenue.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator in this connection would tell us how the average income for the three years mentioned in the bill compares with the average income of the railroads in normal times.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will tell me what he regards as normal times it will be easier for me to answer the question.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, before the war. I want to know, and I think the Senate would like to know, how the income of the three years that have been selected for the average compares with the income of 10 years preceding.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am just estimating it, but I think the average of the 3 years would be $150,000,000 a year more than the average for 10 years.

Mr. NORRIS. Then is it true that the three years selected are practically the most profitable dividend-paying years in the history of railroading in this country?

Mr. CUMMINS. The years 1916 and 1917, with practically all the railroads, and certainly as to the aggregate, show a net operating income very far in excess of any other years in the history of the country. For instance, the net operating income of all the railroads for 1916 was, in round numbers, $1,050,000,000. For the year before, 1915, the same net operating income was only about $755,000,000. The net operating income for the year 1917 is about one billion and forty million dollars. I am speaking in round numbers; I do not remember the exact sum. But those two years go far beyond any other year in amount. I think it is true that there are some years in which the rate of return upon what they call their book value was larger, or as large, anyhow, as during the year 1917; but so far as amounts are concerned, there are no years comparable with 1916 and 1917.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I understood the Senator to answer the question of the Senator from Colorado that the net income of this particular road, the Pennsylvania, was something over 8 per cent after all deductions had been made, of course, of the interest on bonds and various other things. That is true, is it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I said the net income which we will guarantee. In other words, we guarantee an operating income for the Pennsylvania Railroad; and that operating income carried into its net income will pay on all the stock of the Pennsylvania Railroad 8.92 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Another question: That is regardless of the amount of bonds. Suppose, then, that a railroad should be built at a cost of $25,000 a mile, and they should immediately turn around and bond that road for forty or fifty thousand dollars a mile, as has been done at various times. Would not the net income which they receive be that much more proportionately on that part of the income than the difference between the bonds and the actual cost of the road?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would be if that had been true of any past transaction of the Pennsylvania Road. Of course, our guaranty to the Pennsylvania Road would not cover the issuance of bonds in the future, because we have that within our control.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I only speak of it in a general way, wishing to get that matter clear in my mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. The New York Central Railroad will be guaranteed 12.96 per cent upon its capital stock.

The Baltimore & Ohio will be guaranteed 5.83 per cent.

The Pennsylvania Co., as distinguished from the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., will be guaranteed 11.92 per cent.

The Philadelphia & Reading Railway Co. will be guaranteed upon its stock 25.70 per cent.

The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. will be guaranteed 32.90 per cent upon its stock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to understand to what extent these companies will be permitted to pay dividends to their stockholders out of these profits.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a subsequent provision in the bill that without the consent of the President they shall pay no larger dividends than they have been in the habit of paying heretofore.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then in the case of the Pennsylvania Road, for instance, which has been paying 6 per cent, as I recall, it will not be permitted to pay the 8½ per cent to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. They will not be permitted to pay it without the consent of the President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. With the President's consent, then, they might be permitted to distribute all of these earnings in dividends?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes; precisely.

The Michigan Central Railroad is guaranteed an income that will pay 18.48 per cent upon its capital stock, and I suppose a large part of the stock of the Michigan Central is owned by the New York Central.

The Central Railroad of New Jersey is guaranteed an income that will pay 20.25 per cent upon its stock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. One more question: Will the Senator from Iowa state whether the President also has authority to require the investment of some of the surplus earnings in betterments on the roads?

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill provides that he can require railroad companies to better and improve their properties; but, of course, if they do, then we have to begin to pay interest upon that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not during the operation of this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Surely, unless they are taken out of earnings.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am assuming that they are taken out of earnings. Take the case of the Pennsylvania for a concrete case. The Government, under this bill, guarantees a net operating earning of 8½ per cent, is it?

Mr. CUMMINS. 8.92 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. 8.9 per cent. If the President simply permits them to earn their 6 per cent dividend as heretofore, and requires them to put into betterments the remaining 2.9 per cent, will they be permitted to have guaranteed earnings on that additional amount invested in betterments?

Mr. CUMMINS. This bill provides that so long as the Government is in possession of the property the compensation shall not be increased on that account if the betterments are made out of earnings.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. But instantly the roads are returned to their owners, then they begin to charge the public rates that will make returns upon these added values. But I want the Senator from Nebraska to bear in mind that what I am trying to do is to take that 2.92 per cent, in the case of the Pennsylvania Road, and put it into the Treasury of the United States, unless the Director General or the President uses it in the betterment and in the improvement of the property so far as the public needs may require. We have reached a time when it seems to me that if the payment of 6 per cent upon all the capital stock of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and the payment of all the interest upon all its indebtedness together constitute fair and just compensation for the use of the property under all the circumstances, it should be for the Government to take this surplus and use it in the development and betterment of the property; and when it is returned to the Pennsylvania Road, if it ever is returned, let us return it under such conditions that the company will not be permitted at any time to charge the public for a return upon values so created.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. One other question: Under the construction which the Senator from Iowa desires to put upon this law, or under the form in which he desires to put it, would the railroads during the next year earn as much and receive as much as they received during the average of the past three years?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, one can only conjecture about that. The business of the United States may collapse at any moment. There seems to be a disposition to limit the business of the United States now to such businesses as are absolutely necessary to carry on the war. If that policy is pursued, it is perfectly apparent that the volume of traffic will very greatly diminish, and the revenues of these railroads will be very much less.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has misunderstood my question. Suppose the bill is amended to suit his views: I ask him then whether the guaranty which he would make would give as great compensation to the roads for the next year as they have received for the average of the last three years?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not. That is the very thing I am complaining about—that we are guaranteeing these roads their average income under rates that ought to shock the mind of any man who gave examination to the subject; rates that were only permissible because it was necessary to maintain them in order to enable 200,000 miles of the railways in this country to survive. We have been compelled to enrich the Pennsylvania, the New York Central, the C., B. & Q., the North Western, the Union Pacific, in order that other and less favored or less fortunate competitors might live.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the fact is that the Senator from Iowa proposes in this bill to regulate and reform the railroad incomes of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. No. I am proposing to give them a great deal more than they ought to have. I can not understand the mind of any man who believes that these railroads ought to have the income of the last three years just because they have earned such an income in the last three years. That to me is a proposal that is much more mysterious than any of the problems of the tariff with which we have struggled in times gone by. I do not believe that simply because the railways have earned these sums of money in the last three years therefore they are entitled to earn them in the future. I do not believe that the earnings of a railway property form a measure for estimating or determining the value of the railway property. The earnings for the last three years would indicate that the railroad property of the United States was worth more than $21,000,000,000. I do not believe it. I do not think that there has been $12,000,000,000 of independent capital invested in the railway properties of the United States, and I for one intend, so long as my strength endures, to protest against the proposed capitalization of excessive earnings and the unearned increment; and that is what this bill is intended to accomplish.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to assume that I am out of sympathy with his position.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I understand it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is much justification for it; I live in a State in which the prosperous railroads earn very large returns upon their investment; but I wanted to get clearly before the Senate whether the Senator proposes in this bill, which is an emergency measure and a war measure, to really reform the railroad earnings of the country as a permanent policy.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. I propose to offer them what I regard as just compensation for the use of their property.

Some people seem to think that in the emergency, because the United States is struggling for its life, because we are about to call upon all the energies of the people to support our armies and our navies, now is the appropriate time to give the railroads a great deal more than they ought to have. There seems to be an impression that everybody should suffer but the railway companies in the distribution of our burdens. I would very much rather give the railroads this income in time of peace than in time of war. I might find it possible to justify these exactions if we were going forward in a normal way with an opportunity for earnings and profits such as we formerly enjoyed; but I have a good deal of contempt for the profiteers in the conflict in which we are now engaged.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. As I understand the Senator, he objects to the earnings of the railroads he names. His remarks may be applicable to all railroads, but I refer to those he names. He thinks they have been earning unusual, rather what I may characterize as abnormal, profits during the years 1916 and 1917, and that that ought not to be made the basis for compensation to the railroads for the use of their properties during the remainder of the war. If it be true that during the years he mentions, embraced in the period of the war, these earnings have been made by the railroads named, and if it is to be presumed, as I submit it may reasonably be presumed, although I am not arguing the question one way or the other, that like earnings could be made by the same railroads during the current year and the next year, if the war goes on, then during the time while the Government has possession of the railroads I am a little puzzled to know why the capacity earnings of the railroads during the period of the war should not be made a fair basis of compensation for that period.

The bill limits the occupation and control of the railroads to the period of the war, or substantially that. I ask the Senator to inform me if the Pennsylvania or the New York Central or any other railroad earned a certain per cent of profit out of its total business during the years 1916 and 1917, a war period, and could earn in reasonable expectation a similar per cent during the remaining years of the war, whatever it may be, why that would not be a fair basis of compensation for the time we are to have control of the properties.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the basis of the question of the Senator from Missouri, why should we guarantee anything? Why not let the roads earn what they can and let them take what they earn. As far as I am concerned, I am quite——

Mr. STONE. But the Government is going to operate the railroads.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, and that is it precisely. Our whole thought seems to be for the railroads. Here are the railroads in the midst of war and the Government thinks they ought to be managed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. All the officers of the companies are retained, all the employees of the companies are retained. We are guaranteeing to the presidents and managers of these big companies their tremendous salaries. We are guaranteeing to all these officers, and I have no doubt they have earned their money in times past, the compensation which they have formerly received, and I commend that spectacle to the Senator from Missouri when he comes to argue this matter elsewhere. But I am willing to do that if the railroads will take their chances. Give each railroad what it earns under Government direction——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. And if a railroad does not earn anything let it suffer, and if another railroad earns very much let it profit. But we are proposing to make certain what is uncertain. It is just the difference between a Government bond and the note of a speculator without fixed responsibility. You can not——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. You can not float one at the same rate of interest that you float the other. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Iowa has asked what is the necessity for a Government guarantee to the railroads, and he has indicated——

Mr. CUMMINS. No; before the Senator from Arkansas begins, what I stated was in view of the question put by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I understand the necessity of guaranteeing an income and I believe in guaranteeing an income.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well, but certainly the plain indication of the Senator's question was that Congress was doing an injustice to the public in making any guarantee at all, for he followed the question with the declaration that he was willing that the railroads under Government control and operation should be left to earn what they could and to receive what they earned. The Senator now states that he did not intend any such implication.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, I hope I did not say anything of that kind. The Senator from Arkansas misunderstood me. The Senator from Missouri was propounding a question and wanted to know why we could not guarantee the earnings which these companies would receive in the years of the war and for 18 months thereafter, and I said that I was willing that they should receive those earnings, but I hope the Senator from Arkansas did not understand that I am so insane as to think we ought not to accompany this transition with a guarante..

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will permit me, I repeat, the implication which I thought was contained in his answer to the question of the Senator from Missouri, and his declaration was that he was willing that the railroads should be left to earn what they could and to receive what they earned without a Government guarantee; so no guarantee should be made.

In this connection, with the Senator's permission, I will state that the unified operation of the railroads under Federal control will undoubtedly very materially affect the earnings of all the railroads under that control. It will enable some of the railroads to earn very much more than they would have earned under private control and it will prevent many of the railroads from earning as much as they would under private control, and therefore arises the necessity for a Government guaranty of some kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. The statement of the Senator from Arkansas is unanswerable. It would be in the last degree unwise for the Government to assume the direction of the railroads of the United States without making provisions for the necessary income for the railroads. I was simply suggesting that if this bill was founded upon the assumption that the railroads would earn these sums of money in the next two or three years it must be borne in mind that their capacity to earn is conjectural. No human being can determine what they will earn. The whole commercial fabric of the United States may collapse long before the period of Federal control ends. Commerce may diminish, but the pay of the railroads goes on just the same. The guarantee of the Government is binding upon us no matter what may be the consequences of the war.

If I may proceed with this table, I notice that to the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Co. we propose a guarantee in the sum of 647 per cent upon its stock, upon the Chicago & Erie 70 per cent, upon the Hocking Valley 11.94 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has referred to the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Co. and the guarantee of 647 per cent on the capital stock. Can the Senator inform us as to the amount of capital actually invested in that company?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not, but——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I can tell you.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may interrupt the Senator, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] the other day in his very able argument gave us a statement of the property valuation of that company. I do not remember the number of million dollars, but assuming that the property statement was correct the earnings of that company would only be about 10 per cent on the investment.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I happen to know a good deal about the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad. It is not a railroad in the ordinary sense at all. It is a mere incident to the Carnegie Steel Co.'s business. It is a road built to enable them to carry their own ore from Lake ports to Pittsburgh, so that they might operate their mines in the Minnesota regions more economically than if they had their ore hauled by the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad. It was owned entirely within the Carnegie Steel Co. and capitalized at only $500,000, although it operates property worth in the neighborhood of thirty-five or forty million dollars. The earnings are not at all excessive. They do not represent hundreds of per cent; they represent practically a little less than 10 per cent upon the entire capital invested. Those figures are very misleading because of that fact.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not to blame for the deception in the figures. I am simply reading from the report made by this company to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KNOX. I only state the facts. The report does mislead; I do not say the Senator does but the report misleads, because there is no analogy between that property and other railroad property.

Mr. CUMMINS. I quite agree with that. It is a very smaller matter. It is a small railroad.

Mr. KNOX. It is, however, just as well to have it correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think if that railroad stood alone it would hardly be worthy of comment, and I only read it in order to indicate the application of a rule of the sort that I am opposing.

I turn now to other railroads in the table, to which I shall often refer. The Illinois Central Railroad will be guaranteed a net income of 11.33 per cent upon its capital stock; the Louisville & Nashville an income of 16.75 per cent; the Norfolk & Western an income of 12.51 per cent; the Atlantic Coast Line 10.80 per cent. I shall only mention a few of the principal companies in order that the full significance of what we are doing can be understood.

I turn to the western district and find that our guarantee together with other income which the company possesses will furnish to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe a return of 9.70 per cent upon its capital stock. The Chicago & North Western will be guaranteed an income of 10.18 per cent; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, 22.05 per cent; the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie, 12.09 per cent. So I might proceed naming all these railroads which compose the 140,000 miles which my amendment will affect. It is sufficient to say that the average guaranteed income upon capital stock in the eastern district is 11.48 per cent; the average in the southern district is 12.37 per cent, and the average in the western district is 9.96 per cent. Of course these averages are applied only to the roads which have in the last three years earned a net income of more than 5 per cent upon the capital stock.

Mr. President, I have presented the effect of this bill with a great deal of earnestness and at very great length. The subject, I think, interests the people of this country more than any other matter. It is obvious that when these incomes are guaranteed, when wages are increased, as they will be, when the cost of operation increases as it must, the rates which are to be paid by the people of the country for the transportation of their commerce will also be increased.

I think that is the purpose of those who originated the plan which we are asked to approve to increase rates for transportation. There has been a struggle for years, intense, comprehensive, to increase rates. Those who have desired increases have been but partially successful. Whenever the Government guarantees the income which is here proposed, that struggle will have ended in victory for the carriers and these properties will be returned, if they ever are returned, to their owners burdened with a system of rates which will impose unreasonable, unfair taxes or impositions upon the people of the country who are least able to bear their burdens.

I can not avoid the conclusion that we are here proposing to pay for the use of this property at least $175,000,000 per year more than just compensation for its use. I have endeavored to show why my mind tends toward that conclusion. I shall offer an amendment which will not interfere with the payment of interest upon the railway securities, which will not interfere with the payment of any dividends that have heretofore been paid, whether it be 5 per cent or 8 per cent, but which will, when applied to these 86 systems and railroad companies, reduce our guaranty substantially $175,000,000 per year.

Remember that we are undertaking to maintain the properties. We are undertaking to finance them. If enlargements should be necessary, we are undertaking to so deal with them that at the end of the period of Government control they shall be returned to their present owners in as good condition as they now are. All that the owners will lose will be their use in the meantime, and, Senators, if the catastrophe through which we are now passing, if in this world-wide and world-destroying struggle the railway properties can enter and emerge in full complete condition, ready again to perform their service for commerce and receive while they are passing through this ordeal all the interest upon their bonds and all the dividends upon their stock guaranteed and insured by the Government, they ought to be content. To do more for them is to encourage and establish a system of profiteering which the people of the country will condemn and repudiate.

I wonder that the railway owners of the country are not wise enough, have not vision enough, to look forward to the end of this war. We will win the war. No matter how long the struggle may continue we will win the war; but the vital conflict in the interest of the American people will be confronted after the war. I can not help but think that the owners of these vast properties would be wiser if they would recall what is now transpiring in Russia. It would seem to be instructive if they would remember what is moving beneath the surface in Germany. It would help them, I am sure, to a sound judgment if they would look across the sea upon the unrest which is disturbing Great Britain. It is idle to think that America can escape the influences of that great movement sweeping over the earth.

I, for one, as I said before, believe in property; I believe in law; I believe in order; I believe in the Constitution; and I should like to do something to strengthen American institutions against the shock which they are sure to experience. We can not fortify ourselves against that vital moment by taking from the people of this country the money which is proposed in this bill and paying it to the railway corporations.

Mark my words, that the multitudes of America will believe that we are taking from them $175,000,000 annually more than they ought to pay. Remember what I say, that in the days to come they will decide that we have taken from them this vast sum of money and without reason, or without justice, or without necessity have transferred it to coffers already overflowing with riches. I beg the Senate not to do it. If it values stability, if it desires peace and content among the people, if it wants to preserve the love and the affection and the enthusiasm of the people of this country, so that we can press forward with all our strength to a world victory for justice and order, let us not do this unjust thing.

Mr. President, I ask that the table which I referred to as having been prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection the request of the Senator from Iowa will be granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
DIVISION OF STATISTICS,
Washington, February 5, 1918.

The statement covers Class I operating roads whose ratio of average annual net income to capital stock was over 5 per cent for the three years ended June 30, 1917. The totals, by districts, are as follows:

District.	Proposed standard return (A). (b)	Railway operating income for the year ended June 30, 1917, modified as in standard return (D). (f)	Net income less dividends and sinking fund appropriations for the year ended June 30, 1917 (E). (g)	Modified standard return under the proposed amendment (F). (f) (g) (h)	Difference between standard return in S. 3632 and modified standard return. (b) (h) (i)
Eastern	$271,832,392	$287,529,552	$76,861,276	$206,628,725	$65,205,667
Southern	100,931,987	128,147,658	62,874,878	65,272,780	35,659,207
Western	299,214,232	341,618,298	104,227,284	227,004,724	72,209,538
Total	671,978,641	757,295,508	243,963,438	498,904,229	173,074,412

In compiling the data consolidations, reorganizations, etc., were not given consideration, as to analyze all such cases would consume more time than was available. It is probable that the omission would not materially affect the totals.

Statement showing for the roads named certain figures based on interpretations of Senate bill 3632 and of the proposed amendment, compiled from data as returned in the annual reports of the carriers named to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

NOTE A.—Based on the average annual "Railway operating income," plus or minus the net debits or credits of hire of equipment; equipment rents and joint facility rents, for the three years ended June 30, 1917. Railway operating income is railway operating revenues less railway operating expenses, railway taxes and uncollectible railway revenues.

NOTE B.—Represents the average annual par value of common and preferred stock outstanding and not held by or for the issuing company, for the three years ended June 30, 1917.

NOTE C.—"Net income" is "Railway operating income" plus nonoperating income and minus deductions for interest, rents, and certain other fixed charges.

NOTE D.—Based on the latest available figures which are used for illustration only. (See also Note A.)

NOTE E.—Represents "Net income" as reported, less appropriations from income and surplus for sinking and other reserve funds and for dividends. It is possible that it may have been appropriate to consider other items in arriving at this figure, but to expedite the work only the two items mentioned were used.

NOTE F.—In some cases it is possible that the amount shown will need to be increased to provide for the regular dividends, because of fluctuations in nonoperating income items. Where the figures are the same as shown in column (b) the amendment is not understood to supersede the original provisions of the bill.

NOTE A.—Based on the average annual "Railway operating income," plus or minus the net debits or credits of hire of equipment, equipment rents, and joint facility rents, for the three years ended June 30, 1917. Railway operating income is railway operating revenues less railway operating expenses, railway taxes, and uncollectible railway revenues.

NOTE B.—Represents the average annual par value of common and preferred stock outstanding and not held by or for the issuing company, for the three years ended June 30, 1917.

NOTE C.—"Net income" is "Railway operating income," plus nonoperating income and minus deductions for interest, rents, and certain other fixed charges.

NOTE D.—Based on the latest available figures which are used for illustration only. (See also Note A.)

NOTE E.—Represents "Net income" as operated, less appropriations from income and surplus for sinking and other reserve funds and for dividends. It is possible that it may have been appropriate to consider other items in arriving at this figure, but to expedite the work only the two items mentioned were used.

NOTE F.—In some cases it is possible that the amount shown will need to be increased to provide for the regular dividends, because of fluctuations in nonoperating income items. Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, the Chair announces that a quorum is present. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I express the hope that Senators whose other duties will enable them to do so will remain in the Chamber during the brief time that I shall attempt to discuss two matters connected with the bill under consideration.

In all that has been said by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] concerning the importance of this measure I heartily concur. Considered from the standpoint of property values involved and the economic issues which are in part, if not wholly, determined by the bill, it is perhaps more far-reaching than any other measure that has come before the Congress.

It is not necessary to argue the wisdom of promptly disposing of the issues raised by the pending legislation. That must be apparent to every Senator. I do not mean to imply that undue haste should occur in determining such important questions as we now consider, but it may with propriety be asserted that all unnecessary delay should be avoided, and the questions now at issue should be determined just as quickly as their importance and nature will permit.

The Director General is very anxious that Congress shall act, for it is necessary to arrange as soon as practicable for certain funds in connection with the maintenance, the depreciation, and the operation of the carriers under his control. It is desirable to end, in so far as legislation can do so, the existing uncertainty as to the status of the railroads and the policy of the Government in the operation of them and to take such action as may be necessary to prevent loss and inconvenience to the carriers and to the public resulting from the lack of necessary arrangements for maintenance and indispensable improvements.

Furthermore, the financial plans and policies of the administration can be much more readily formulated and consummated; the enormous funds necessary to be secured through liberty loans and otherwise for the requirements of the Treasury in the prosecution of the war can be much more readily obtained when the vexing questions connected with this legislation have been answered and the purpose and policy of the Government respecting the control and operation of transportation lines have been definitely fixed by law.

This bill providing for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control and for just compensation to their owners should be kept before the Senate until disposed of. It ought not to be laid aside for the consideration of appropriation measures or other bills, however important, unless of a very emergent nature.

It is not my intention to undertake at this time a discussion of all the important controverted subjects connected with the bill. I prefer rather to pursue a course which I hope will be helpful to some Senators who desire to understand that feature of the bill immediately under consideration, namely, section 1, relating principally to the authorization of agreements between the Government and the railroads in settlement of the compensation due the owners for the taking of their property by the President. I shall direct my remarks for the present principally to the subject of "Compensation." Before entering upon a discussion of this fundamentally important feature of the bill it may not be undesirable to discuss another topic concerning which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has expressed an opinion contrary to that asserted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

SOME OF THE REASONS FOR FEDERAL CONTROL.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], in his very able and instructive address on this bill delivered on Wednesday last stated that, in his opinion, it was unnecessary and unwise for the Federal Government to take possession of and to operate the railroads; that all justifiable ends could have been as readily accomplished through private control and operation under the supervision and counsel of a central authority, the Director General.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has forcefully informed the Senate of the reasons requiring the Government to take over the roads and operate them, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has reinforced his position in this regard, expressing the opinion that the Executive should have acted when the war began, and that the only important mistake was in too long delaying action under the act of August 29, 1916.

I believe, and shall attempt to demonstrate, that Federal control and operation were necessary, indeed, almost unavoidable, and that the President acted wisely in not exercising the powers conferred upon him by Congress to take over the railroads and operate them in a time of war until the necessity for such action had been recognized by public opinion. For the Government to take possession of and use the railroads was a very radical step, involving it in great liabilities and responsibilities. And it does not seem to me to be a proper subject of censure or criticism that the Chief Executive was not hasty in exercising the very extraordinary authority.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] does not, in my opinion reflect the prevailing judgment among other well-informed students of transportation conditions in the United States when he declares that it was unnecessary and unwise to take over and operate the railroads during the present war. His legal knowledge, his broad experience and devotion to the public interest give force to any opinion he may express, but it seems to me that the weight of the argument is against his contention. With no disposiion to assert myself as an authority on the subject, I take the liberty of summarizing briefly some of the arguments which, to my mind, conclusively justify the taking and operation of the railroads by the Government under existing conditions.

During recent years railroad extensions and construction have not kept pace with the requirements of commerce. It would not be profitable to enter upon a discussion of the reasons for the partial suspension of railroad building in the United States during late years. It is the fact which is important in this debate. While traffic was constantly and rapidly increasing, railroad extensions and equipment were not being provided in proportion. With the outbreak of the war, transportation requirements, particularly on the lines approaching the Atlantic seaboard, were greatly increased. The railroads seemed unable correspondingly to increase their facilities. In this address I lay no blame upon them for this.

While many lines in other parts of the country promptly transported the freights tendered them, the railroads in the East, particularly those which reach our greatest seaport, became overcrowded, resulting in thousands of freight cars being used for warehouse purposes. The inability of ships sailing from New York Harbor to obtain coal, added to other embarrassments to shipping, accentuated the difficulties until the congestion became appalling.

It became apparent that one practical means of relief could be found in the diversion of freight. This could not be legally accomplished under private control, the law giving to the shipper the privilege of routing his freight. The Federal Government operating the roads could disregard shippers' routings and send the freight over any line.

Moreover, the rerouting of freight materially affects the operating revenues of the carriers and implies the necessity for pooling earnings, which can not legally be done under private control. Even if the antipooling sections of the law had been repealed, railroads operating under a competitive system, which has been regarded as one of the fundamental features of private control and operation, would not be able promptly to effect voluntary arrangements which would deprive one road of its normal business for the benefit of a competing carrier.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to say that in that regard I agree with the Senator. I do not wish to be understood as disagreeing on that proposition. Government direction was undoubtedly necessary to accomplish that, because under the present law the railroads themselves could not bring about that result.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator's statement adds strength to the argument which I am attempting to make, and I thank him for it.

It should be remembered that at the time the President took possession of the railroads the military operations of the Government were being greatly embarrassed. Troops, supplies, and munitions destined for the battle front were being delayed both on the railroads and at port. Only the strong arm of the Government could clear the lines, hurry necessary fuel to the ships, and hasten the transportation of soldiers and supplies to France. Unified control was partially accomplished through the railroads war board, a voluntary organization composed of some of the best and ablest railroad men in the Nation while the carriers were yet under private control. The service which this board rendered was in many respects admirable and highly commendable, but the board could not make or repeal law, and, most important of all, it could not remove the natural obstacles to unified operation created by the desire and obligation of every railroad manager to secure for his line all the business he could obtain.

Under Government control it is possible to make common use of all tracks, facilities, and equipment. This could not be legally done under private control.

Under private control it was not possible to distribute efficiently cars and motive power, and in consequence some roads were at times over supplied, while others were unable to obtain a sufficiency. Under private control when freight was diverted by the action of the war board, it probably constituted a violation of law and gave rise to many difficulties which do not arise under Federal control.

Furthermore, the railroad representatives were fearful of a decline in railroad credit. They claimed to need the financial support of the Government to sustain and stabilize railroad securities, in the absence of which the railroads were threatened with ruin.

Before the President exercised the powers conferred upon him by the act of August, 1916, the public had generally come to anticipate the taking over and operation of the roads by the Government, and I believe the wisdom of his action has been disclosed by events which have already occurred and will be further vindicated in the future.

Whatever may be our views concerning the wisdom and necessity of Federal control, it is an accomplished fact that the President, under the authority of Congress, has taken possession of the railroads and is operating them through the agency of the Director General. The taking possession of the roads and the use of them by the Government creates a legal liability on the part of the Government to the owners to pay for the use of the property taken.

THE NATURE AND EXTENT OF THE GOVERNMENT LIABILITY.

I shall now briefly speak of the nature and extent of the Government liability. This legislation is framed upon the theory that the Government's possession and use of the railroads is merely temporary, and that, therefore, the true legal measure of "just compensation" is not the value of the property taken, but is the value of its use. The Congress can not declare, as has been heretofore stated in the debate and as every Senator probably understands, what constitutes just compensation. It can not determine the amount due the railroads and provide a fixed sum by appropriation. Under the Constitution, the question as to what constitutes just compensation is a legal question, to be determined by the courts after a consideration of all the facts and circumstances. The Congress can not even instruct or direct the courts to embrace or exclude elements of value, nor can it restrict them in determining the amount of just compensation due. If the Congress could impose upon the courts a direction as to what facts should be considered and what elements of value should be embraced in determining the question of just compensation, it could effectually confiscate property and thus defeat the very purposes of the constitutional provision that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." I maintain, notwithstanding the prolonged and, to my mind, in some respects erroneous argument of the Senator from Iowa, that the standard return is the best and fairest basis for agreement as to just compensation that has been suggested, for the all-controlling reason that it approximates closely the legal measure of the amount recoverable at law.

Mr. President, the Government's obligation is to pay to the railroads what is due them for the use of their property. Congress can not deprive the carriers of the right to receive compensation for the use of their property taken and used by the Government. Certainly no Senator would desire to do that. The Congress can provide the means and the tribunal for determining the amount of compensation to be paid for private property taken for public use, but it can not restrict or circumscribe the power of the tribunal to determine the amount of compensation to be paid. The standard return provided for in this bill—namely, the average annual railway operating income for the three-year period ended June 30, 1917—constitutes a just basis for an agreement respecting just compensation. Some have claimed that the compensation which may be obtained under this standard return is too little, while others, including the Senator from Iowa, have asserted that it may be entirely too much.

Every Senator who has discussed this subject has expressed the opinion that it is both desirable and necessary to enact legislation to enable the President to make agreements with the railroads, and thus avoid the necessity for litigating the question of compensation in the courts. This proposition seems self-evident. If the railroads of the country should be remitted in the first instance to the courts for a determination of the question of just compensation, it would require the talent, the energy, and the resources of many of the best men of the Nation for many years before these disputes could be settled. In addition to this, it would lessen the efficiency of the transportation systems and weaken the Government in the conduct of the war. It must be admitted by all that it is desirable to provide for settling the question of compensation out of court. Of course, the Congress can not take away from the railroads the right to litigate the question. We can not compel any carrier to enter into an agreement. We must provide a means for determining judicially the amount of compensation due any carrier for the taking and use of its property by the Government. It follows that any agreement provision, to be acceptable, must be of such a nature that it is likely to be availed of, both by the Government and by the carriers. It would be futile to spend our time in formulating a method for settling out of court these disputes if the provisions of the law enacted by Congress were such that in all probability the railroads would not take advantage of them, but would prefer to take their remedy through judicial process.

The chief value of the standard return is that it approximates the actual amount of compensation which a court would in all probability award a carrier upon a trial of its case. It is necessary and advisable that any agreement provision which we write in this bill should have that characteristic. Since the railroads can not be deprived of the right to sue for compensation and have a court pass upon the amount due, it would be absurd to deny to them approximately the amount to which they would be plainly entitled under the law. It seems to me to be the wise course to so write this bill that the railroads can obtain without litigation approximately what they would be likely to get through litigation, and if we do this, in all probability the carriers will enter into an agreement; if we fail to do this, they will likely decline to enter into agreements, and will resort to the courts for their remedy.

It is my purpose now to attempt to show that the provision in this bill respecting compensation through voluntary settlement between the President and the carriers is fair and just, and approximates the basis upon which the courts would determine it. If I can establish this proposition, I will be entitled to have your favorable action concerning this provision.

The primary and fundamental element which a court will consider in determining the value of the use of property, is its earning capacity. I do not mean to imply that other elements do not enter into the subject, or to assert that other facts should not receive due consideration. I merely say that the principal thing in determining the value of the use of property is its earning capacity. The carriers had established their earning capacity under Government regulation and supervision. A system of rates which determines the amount of their earnings has been in operation with the approval of the Government as just and reasonable, and this system of rates has been recommended as a fair basis for present and future charges. That is to say the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed the rates, and recommended to Congress that the rates so fixed be determined legislatively as fair and reasonable.

Prior to the passage of the act to regulate commerce in 1887 the power of the railroads to make rates was unlimited. Few legal restrictions, especially of a Federal nature, existed on the authority of a carrier to charge any rate it desired. With the act of 1887 began the period of regulation which extends to the present. The act of 1890, commonly called the Sherman Antitrust Act, the act of 1906, and the act of 1910 constituted an evolution in the regulation of the railroads through Federal agency. Gradually the power of the Federal regulating body was increased and extended until now it may be said that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to make and determine rates.

The railroads blame upon overregulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission and State commissions many of the deficiencies in railroad affairs. Their representatives assert that the Government, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, has pursued a niggardly policy which has prevented them from making sufficient earnings to adequately provide extensions, additions, and equipments. I do not subscribe to this declaration without material modification.

The standard return is based upon the average annual earnings for the three-year period ended June 30, 1917. These earnings were made under Federal regulation, under rates fixed and controlled by a Federal agency, the Interstate Commerce Commission.

What would be the legal effect of this in a judicial proceeding to determine just compensation? In my opinion, the earnings of the railroads under rates fixed by the Government agency would not be conclusive of just compensation. Evidence would be admitted to show that the earnings which the Government permitted were inadequate to meet the requirements of the constitutional provision as to just compensation, or, on the other hand, that they were in excess of just compensation. The rate-making power, within certain limitations, is, of course, a legislative power. It would be perfectly competent for the legislature to adopt toward the railroads a policy which would enable them to realize very great profits, profits in excess of the measure of the value of the use of their property when taken by the public. The principal limitation upon the legislative power to make rates is that they shall not be confiscatory. A rate which is not confiscatory may not, however, be compensatory in the true sense of that term. It would undoubtedly be competent to show as an evidence of the value of the property or its use the earnings of the railroads under Government regulation. In all probability a court would give great weight and credence to this evidence.

It is not only true that the standard return approximates the legal basis for just compensation, but it is also the most convenient plan that has been suggested for adjusting controversies concerning compensation. It involves the use of terms, records, and accounting systems of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Some difference of opinion has been expressed as to just what items should be embraced in the standard return.

Apparently all are agreed that it should include operating revenues, operating expenses, railway tax accruals, and uncollectible railway revenues, but there is considerable difference of opinion as to whether other items should be included. The present bill as amended includes "equipment rents" and "joint facility rents." In determining the standard return it is well to know something of the details of the character of the Government operations, what changes will be effected in existing methods and practices, and the purpose of the Government in providing the standard return, or any other, for that matter.

During the course of the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] the question arose as to what is the necessity or justification for the Government to make a guaranty to the railroads. I attempted then to explain briefly the justification for this proposal. Under Government operation and control it will be the policy to affect very materially the business of the carriers operated by the Government. Some of the railroads will no doubt have their business very materially increased, while others will experience a great falling off in the traffic which they carry.

It may with propriety be assumed, first, that the Government will so conduct the railway operations as to affect the net income of individual carriers, and perhaps of the carriers as a whole, and the net income will very likely be quite different from what it would be under private operation.

Second, the Government desires to be just and fair, both to the public and to each individual carrier whose property is taken over, and it, therefore, desires to establish a basis for the standard return that will not favor one carrier as against another.

Third, as to the roads taken over and operated, the Government will receive the income and make or authorize the expenditures so far as the income items included in the standard return are concerned, and it will further guarantee to each of such carriers a definite amount, retaining the surplus income, if any, and providing from other sources for any deficit there may be, and, further, that the carriers, individually, will be responsible for receipts and expenditures involving income or other items not included in determining the standard return.

If these assumptions be correct, every item of income that may be affected in one way or another by Government operation should be included in arriving at the standard return. Of course, it is not necessary to carry this idea to the extreme. It is the opinion of the best experts I have consulted that in practically all cases justice will be done if the standard return outlined in the proposed bill is adopted.

Some of the reasons justifying these conclusions are embraced in the following suggestions:

EQUIPMENT RENTS.

The term "equipment rents" includes not only hire or rent of freight cars but also of locomotives, passenger cars, floating equipment, and work equipment. As to most roads the item of greatest importance is "hire of freight cars." The credit to this account represents amounts receivable by an owning company for the use of its freight cars leased or interchanged, and the debit represents amounts payable by the using carrier for the use of freight cars of other carriers leased or interchanged and for the use of freight cars of individuals and companies not subject to the act to regulate commerce. Taking the carriers as a whole, the balance is always a debit. As to freight cars interchanged among carriers in the United States, the debits and credits should equal each other, but freight cars are frequently leased from individuals or companies that do not report to the commission, in which case there would be a debit with no corresponding credit. The payments made for the use of private freight cars are also a debit, with no corresponding credit. There is a large interchange of freight cars with Canadian roads and some interchange with Mexican roads; and as the roads in these foreign countries do not report to the Interstate Commerce Commission the car interchange may affect the balance either way, depending upon the ownership of the cars interchanged. There is also a negligible amount of income received by the carriers for freight cars rented to industrial concerns, logging roads, and so forth, that do not report to the commission and for which there is no corresponding debit.

Rents from locomotives and passenger cars are largely between carriers, although either the debits or credits to income may be affected by rentals received or paid to companies which do not report to the commission or at least do not report as steam roads. For example: A carrier might rent a locomotive to or from an industrial concern or a logging road, neither of which reports to the commission, or it might rent a passenger-train car to or from the Pullman Co. which does report to the commission, but not as a steam railroad. Floating equipment is perhaps generally rented from individuals or concerns other than steam railroads so that in the railroad account the balance as a whole would probably always be a debit. The amounts received and paid from the use of work equipment are of minor importance, and perhaps represent in most cases payments among steam railroads, so that the debits and credits should be approximately equal.

The Government operations will undoubtedly affect the use of equipment. The Government may send to Canada or to Mexico a greater number than usual of the cars owned by the carriers of the United States, thus increasing the rental credit, or it may so conduct operations that a greater number than usual of cars of the Canadian or Mexican roads may be used on the lines of our carriers, thus increasing the rental debit; it might require the railroads to rent a greater number of units of floating equipment or to release units now in use by the steam railroads; it might require the Pullman Co. to turn over all or certain of its cars for use by the steam railroads as their equipment rather than Pullman equipment; it might change the rate or the basis for the allowance to private freight-car owners for the use of their cars, thus affecting the amount of such payments; and it might, so far as some carriers are concerned, entirely change the movement of freight using some lines exclusively for passenger service and others for freight service.

The effect upon the total, however, is of little importance as compared with the effect upon the income of individual roads. It is conceivable and, indeed, quite probable that locomotives may be transferred from southern and western roads to eastern roads. If the item "rent for locomotives" be omitted in arriving at the standard return, the eastern roads, it would seem, will individually be required to pay a rental for such of these locomotives as they may use, and this will be an expenditure chargeable to income, for which no provision for reimbursement will have been made. The use of the locomotives, however, will not benefit the eastern carriers, because their returns from freight and passenger service will have been fixed on the results of operations during past years. In this case the eastern roads would be the losers and the southern and western roads the gainers.

In case the Government should make a freight road of one carrier and a passenger road of another, the income of these two carriers from rent of equipment might be affected in exactly opposite ways—one might be benefited and the other damaged.

It may be said with conservatism that to omit the one item of "equipment rents" from those included in determining the standard returns may result in bankrupting fairly prosperous roads, unless, of course, means be adopted to prevent the injustice that may fairly be expected to result.

JOINT-FACILITY RENTS.

It is a matter of general knowledge that the gross rental for joint facilities—facilities used in common by two or more carriers—is in part an operating expense and in part a rent proper. In some leases the contract stipulates for the use of the joint facilities at a rate per ton, per car, per mile, or some lump-sum basis, the payment including not only rent (income) but maintenance and operation as well. In other leases the contract stipulates that the income item of rents based upon a percentage rate applied to the cost of the facilities as well as to the expenses of maintenance and operation shall be divided upon a tonnage or per car basis. It is, therefore, evident that no hard and fast rule can be laid down for the separation of the rental feature from the operating feature, nor for the apportionment of the rental feature between the users of the facility. In the case of the first arrangement mentioned, the joint-facility rent is not a fixed amount nor does it appear to bear any relation to the capital invested. As a matter of fact, it is what is left after expenses have been provided for, maintenance and operation being apportioned as closely as can be determined to actual cost. The rent necessarily depends largely upon the volume of traffic handled. For this reason it should be accorded the same treatment as operating expenses and not burden the income of a road with expenses from which it will derive no revenue and, conversely, relieve the income of a road of expenses traceable to the traffic of that road.

The result in the aggregate, and consequently the amount involved in the Government guarantee will not be appreciably affected since the debits to the income of the lessee roads will practically equal the credits to the income of the lessor roads. For this reason the amount paid by the Government will not be appreciably affected if joint-facility rents are included in the standard returns. However, the inclusion will prevent many cases of injustice to carriers which might otherwise arise.

LEASED ROAD RENTS.

Some experts claim that "leased road rents" should not be included in the standard returns, for the reason that they are not a measure of the carrier's operations.

MISCELLANEOUS RENTS.

The items included in miscellaneous rents are relatively unimportant, and in most cases will not be seriously affected by Government operation. Consequently these items need not be included in the standard returns.

Thus the standard return approximates the measure of compensation to which the carriers are legally entitled and at the same time will prevent unfair discrimination in the amount of compensation to be paid individual carriers. It is also consistent with existing methods of accounting prevailing among the railroads and in the Interstate Commerce Commission and will, therefore, present little technical difficulty in ascertaining the sums to be paid under such agreements as may be made.

In the event no agreement is made the amount of just compensation due may be investigated by boards of referees who will report their findings to the President. He may then agree with any carrier upon any sum as compensation not in excess of the amount found due by the board of referees.

As already stated the provisions in the bill authorizing agreements are designed to afford a fair and speedy method of determining out of court controversies concerning compensation.

If no agreement is made based upon the findings of the referees, either the President or the carrier may institute a proceeding before the Court of Claims for the determination of the amount of compensation and in such proceeding the report of the referees is made prima facie evidence of the amount due.

Considering all the facts and circumstances, it appears that the provisions in this bill relating to the amicable adjustment of compensation due the carriers are fair to both the public and the railroads.

If the railroads had continued in private operation it is quite probable that the amount which the public would have been required to pay for transportation would have exceeded the amount that will be paid to the railroads under Federal control. I do not believe any well-informed person will assert that there existed at the time the Government took possession of the railroads any considerable probability of a substantial reduction in the early future of railroad rates. On the contrary, it appears quite probable that if the Government had not taken over the roads an increase in rates might have been made. Since the standard return represents an average for the three-year period, which embraces one lean year and two prosperous years, as to railroad earnings, it is not unfair and it does not appear likely that the railroads would voluntarily relinquish all claims for compensation or the right to have the amount of compensation due them determined by legal process, for sums manifestly less than could be recovered in court.

THE STANDARD RETURN COMPARED WITH OTHER PLANS FOR COMPENSATION.

No other plan has been suggested which, in my opinion, so nearly as the standard return meets the requirement of fairness and justness to both the public and the carriers.

AVERAGE MARKET VALUE OF RAILROAD STOCKS.

It has been suggested that the average market value of railroad stocks for a fixed period constitutes a better basis.

The evidence disclosed that the market value of railroad stocks bears little relation to the earning capacity of the roads, or, for that matter, to the value of the railroad property used for carrier purposes.

The market value of railroad stocks is influenced, if not controlled, by many other conditions. In some notable cases when the earnings of a road have been at their maximum the stocks have sold at a much lower price than at other times when the earnings have been far less.

Take another instance: When a railroad management has "skinned" the property, that is, has stinted expenditures for maintenance, depreciation, betterments, and extensions, and has declared substantially all earnings in dividends, the stocks have found high values on the markets.

Furthermore, railroad stocks, as everyone knows, have been the subject of speculation and manipulation and do not, therefore, furnish a fair or stable basis to determine the value of the use of the property upon which they are supposed to be based.

In illustration of the unfairness which would result from basing compensation upon the market value of railroad stocks I cite the testimony of Mr. Kruttschnitt, at pages 293 to 296 of the hearings. I will read a portion of his testimony.

Mr. Kruttschnitt was asked by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] this question:

It is something the company can do whatever it likes with. In other words, I did not contemplate compelling the railway companies to divide their compensation among the shareholders in dividends if they did not desire to do it. We are dealing with the railway companies which own the property.

Mr. Kruttschnitt had been asked by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] some time previously his opinion concerning the proposal to base the compensation upon the average market value of railroad stocks, and here is his reply:

Well, it seems to us that if you impress or commandeer—which is what the Government has done—the use of these properties from the owners that you should pay a fair return on the value of the properties and not on market prices of stock, which are notoriously fickle, follow no law whatever, and are subject to violent fluctuations, sometimes for a reason that can be assigned, and more frequently for reasons that no man can assign.

The best test of the value of the use of the property which the Government takes is, of course, the return or income which the owners have been getting from it before the date of impressment, and my views yesterday were directed to that feature of compensation. Now, if you take the commission's estimates or statements to this committee of the market value of stocks, over a certain period which they worked up, I think, at your request——

Senator CUMMINS. In that respect I hope Mr. Kruttschnitt will take into account the fact that the total furnished by the commission is of comparatively little value, because for the three years that it names it simply takes the high point and the low point for the year and makes an average of the two. A fairer average of the market value of stock would require an enlarged basis.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Quite right. I did not know how it was arrived at. I simply got it off these statements. If they are not reliable, I do not think it is worth while to waste any of the committee's time in argument on it, except to say if they had been reliably gathered, and if they had multiplied the total bonds and stock issued by these prices, you would have gotten for the years in question—which I think were 1912, 1916, and 1917—values which were highest in 1912, lower in 1916, and still lower in 1917. In the interval values of the property have increased largely from 1912 to 1917. In other words, making the multiplications, you will find that the valuation of the properties derived from the multiplication of the average cost of stocks and bonds by their amounts would represent $1,600,000,000 less in the latter period than the former; yet in the interim $2,000,000,000 more money has been put into the property, so it shows how misleading such a plan of deducing value would be.

In answer to a further question Mr. Kruttschnitt made this statement:

Now, to take some concrete examples, I will cite Southern Pacific stock, as it is our own stock, and I am more familiar with it than any other. Southern Pacific stock sold about 10 years ago at its maximum, which was $128 or $130. It sold a couple of weeks ago at $75, a fall of 55 points—$55 a share.

In the same period the Southern Pacific Co. put $400,000,000 of new money—actual cash—into its property.

Senator POMERENE. In what period?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. In about 10 years; and increased its property values by about 50 per cent.

Senator POMERENE What do you mean by that?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I mean that, using approximate figures of 10 years ago, the property values of the Southern Pacific properties were $800,000,000 and to-day about $1,200,000,000. Now, the actual cash put in the property increased about 50 per cent, and the market quotations of the stock fell 55 points on 130—that is, 42 per cent. The money put in the property increased 50 per cent, and the market value of the stock decreased 42 per cent.

Further on he made this statement, after reading which I will proceed with my argument:

I cite that to show that without any increase in the amount of stock the market quotations have little or nothing to do with the intrinsic value. Remember, market quotations apply to a very small fraction of the stocks of conservative companies. There is a certain amount floating around that is bought and sold, but the great mass of the stock of the companies is held for investment and is not on the market. The price would no doubt be very different if the entire stock were on the market.

Mr. Kruttschnitt is one of the best informed men concerning railroad matters and especially railroad finances in the United States.

Another plan which is merely a modification of that just discussed is that the Government should pay to the carriers the amount of interest on their indebtedness and their regular dividends. The objection to this plan is threefold. It would not be acceptable to the railroads. Few, if any, agreements would be made under it, and the whole subject matter would be remitted to the courts. As I have already said, it is useless to authorize agreements that will not be made, and it is the part of wisdom to permit agreements that ought to be made and probably will be entered into.

This objection of itself, if well founded, is of course conclusive.

However, a second objection exists in the fact that this plan would penalize conservative railroad management and capitalize or place a premium on reckless railroad financing. Managements which have strained every effort to pay dividends, carriers which have been negligent in the matter of improvements, additions, equipments, extensions, and maintenance in order to pay large dividends would receive more compensation than others which have been properly managed and, while only declaring small dividends, have kept up, improved, and extended their properties.

In the third place I think this proposition is open to the objection that it makes no adequate provision for the future as to maintenance.

Of course it could be modified so as to embrace a guaranty for adequate maintenance, but that is not contemplated in the proposition as submitted.

A representative of the railroad brotherhoods suggested that the compensation contemplated in the standard return provided for in this bill be paid until the Interstate Commerce Commission could determine the actual investment of the property for carrier purposes, and that when the commission had determined the same compensation be based upon a reasonable percentage of this investment.

It is to be noted that this proposition recognizes and accepts for temporary purposes the standard return. Mr. Prouty, who has had the direction of the valuation of the physical properties of railroads, stated to the committee that it would probably be three years before the work as to any of the carriers would be finally determined. This fact, of course, renders the suggestion inapplicable at present. Moreover, it involves a very important controversy concerning which there exists very great difference. The committee did not deem it advisable to inject into this bill the long-standing and far-reaching dispute concerning what constitutes the correct basis of value as to railroad property and as to railroad rates.

The total amount of compensation which the President is authorized to agree upon with the carriers under the provisions of this bill can not be definitely stated for two reasons: First, it is not yet known what carriers will be retained under Federal control; and second, we can not now determine what amounts may be paid to roads under agreements made between the carriers and the President in exceptional cases.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has, however, stated the total amount which the President is authorized to agree upon with all the carriers as accurately as the subject is capable of being stated. It is as follows:

Net railway operating income for class 1 roads.

1916	984,872,959
Average	896,259,264

The Interstate Commerce Commission has made an estimate which will bring this total, if all roads in classes 2 and 3 are embraced in the agreement, to $935,000,000, approximately $100,000,000 less than the amount received by them in 1917. The commission also estimates investments by the carriers in their property made during the period between June 30 and December 31, 1917, at $130,403,315. If the President should fix the rate at 5 per cent this would amount to $6,500,000, making the total $941,500,000. After deducting interest on debt, war taxes must be deducted to find the amount available for dividends.

THE BRITISH PLAN OF COMPENSATION TO RAILROADS WHILE UNDER GOVERNMENT CONTROL.

In critcizing the authorization in this bill for agreement as to compensation as too favorable to the railroads the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] made a comparison between the British plan for compensation to railroads while under Government control and that contemplated in this bill.

I was so astonished at some of the statements which he made that I asked for a copy of the notes of his remarks.

On page 33 of these remarks, as submitted to me by the official stenographer, the Senator from Iowa is quoted as making the following statement:

> There was no agreement made between the Government of Great Britain and the railroads of Great Britain. No one suggested making any agreement between the public and these railway companies.

In answer to a question of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], if shortly after the taking over an agreement was not arrived at as a basis of compensation, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] made the following statement:

> No; as I understand the record made there, and as it was introduced before our committee, the consent of the railway companies of Great Britain with regard to compensation was not asked. The act of 1871, under which the Government took possession of the railroads in 1914, was not substantially different from our act of 1916, and made no provision for compensation other than the general statement that when the power exercised under it did take place the compensation was to be made. When on the 4th day of August, I believe, 1914, the council in Great Britain determined it was necessary to take over the railroads and they were taken over and the operating body, the directors appointed by the law and who were in existence at the time they were taken over, simply published a statement that for the week following—and I want to mark that, because it is one of the things that we will presently have to consider in this bill—for one week the Government would take over the railroads of the country and would pay or guarantee the net income for 1913. That is, guarantee the net income that was earned in 1913, with some modifications that were to be made by consideration of the earnings for the first six months or seven months of 1914.

This statement is totally at variance with the record as I understand it. I have before me a copy of the British act entitled "The regulation of the forces act, 1871." In section 16 of that act there is a clause expressly authorizing agreements between the Government and the carriers as to compensation. I will read the provision:

> There shall be paid to any person or body of persons whose railroad or plant may be taken possession of in pursuance of this section, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, such full compensation for any loss or injury they may have sustained by the exercise of the powers of the secretary of state under this section as may be agreed upon between the said secretary of state and the said person or body of persons, or, in case of difference, may be settled by arbitration in manner provided by the lands-clauses consolidation act, 1845.

So, in answer to the assertion of the Senator from Iowa that no agreement was asked and no agreement was authorized in that statute, I read the statute itself. It is not only true that the act authorized agreements as to compensation, but on September 15, 1914, it was announced that the Government and companies had come to an agreement.

This agreement, although amended six months later, and again modified in certain important respects, is still the basis of the financial arrangement between the Government and the railways.

THE TERMS OF THE AGREEMENT.

The terms of the agreement are briefly stated as follows:

> His Majesty's Government have agreed with the railway companies concerned that, subject to the undermentioned conditions, the compensation to be paid them shall be the sum by which the aggregate net receipts of their railways for the period during which the Government are in possession of them shall fall short of the aggregate net receipts for the corresponding period of 1913. If, however, the net receipts for the first half of 1914 were less than the first half of 1913, the sum payable is to be reduced in the same proportion. This sum, together with the net receipts of the railway companies taken over, is to be distributed amongst those companies in proportion to the net receipts of each company during the period with which comparison is made.
> The compensation to be paid under this arrangement will cover all special services, such as those in connection with military and naval transports rendered to the Government by the railway companies concerned, and it will therefore be unnecessary to make any payments in respect to such transports on the railways taken over.

In addition to the net receipts of railways proper the Government guaranty extended to the net receipts of six classes of enterprises when owned by railway companies included in the agreement. These six classes all follow:

First, omnibuses and other passenger vehicles not running on a railway.

Second, steamboats.

Third, canals.

Fourth, docks, harbors, and wharves.

Fifth, hotels, restaurants, refreshment rooms, and cars.

Sixth, other separate business carried on by the companies.

Thus it will be seen, the statement of the Senator from Iowa to the contrary, that the law of Great Britain did authorize an agreement between the railway companies and the Government touching the compensation. It will also be observed, notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from Iowa, that the agreement was in fact entered into, and under the terms of that agreement the Government not only guaranteed, with certain modifications, the net income of the railroads for 1913, which was the best year they had ever known, but it also guaranteed six other classes of business which had no immediate relationship to the carrier business.

I repeat, it is apparent that under the agreement entered into by the British Government with the carriers immediately after they were taken over the Government not only guaranteed the net income for the year 1913 as modified by the comparison with a portion of the year 1914, but it also guaranteed noncarrier business of six classes in which the railroads were engaged, including hotels, refreshment rooms, and cars. In addition to this the Government received free transportation of troops and supplies and assumed the payment of 25 per cent of the bonus to railroad employees. I have not undertaken to work out a comparison between this British guaranty and the guaranty contemplated in this bill, but it is perfectly apparent that the statements of the Senator from Iowa to the effect that no agreement was entered into between British railroads and the British Government is error.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not say that the law of 1871 did not authorize an agreement. It not only authorized an agreement, but it provided a tribunal for determining differences in case no agreement is made. I did say that the compensation was fixed by the Government without an agreement. I may have been in error in that statement, although I understood it to be true at the time I made it. What was in my mind was that immediately after the 4th day of August, when the British Government took possession of the railroads, it promulgated the basis of the compensation that it would pay to the railroads, and there was no agreement at that time. I had not seen the document which the Senator from Arkansas is now reading at the time I made the statement, but it is quite apparent from its terms that there did finally come an agreement between the Government and the railroads that embodied the order which was originally made. In so far I am quite willing to acknowledge the error of my statement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am interested to know what was the actual compensation fixed. The Senator refers to a particular year. What was the dividend paid during that year?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am going to discuss that. It follows as a logical sequence to what I have just referred, and if the Senator will permit me, I will take it up in the order I had intended. It will be only two or three minutes before I reach it, if that long.

It may be mentioned in this connection that the railroads of Great Britain are standardized; that dividends and interest rates are lower in Great Britain than in the United States; and that the British guaranty can not furnish a reliable basis of comparison as to what should be the guaranty in the United States.

Now I am coming to the point that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has just asked me about. I am going to discuss now briefly dividends under British control.

DIVIDENDS UNDER BRITISH CONTROL.

On page 49 of the stenographer's notes of his remarks the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] made this further statement with respect to dividends paid under British control of railways:

> Great Britain is now paying on an average of 4 per cent upon the railway bonds and 3½ per cent upon the railway stock.

It is not my purpose to undertake an analysis of the British system of control of railroads, but if an argument against this bill is based upon the practice of our ally concerning the operating of railroads by public authority, it is essential that the material facts upon which that argument is based be accurately stated.

The proviso in the agreement as to compensation providing for a proportionate reduction of the amount to be paid by the Government to the railways of the net receipts of the companies for the first half of 1914 were less than the net receipts of the first half of 1913 was withdrawn January 1, 1915. Thereafter the sum which the Government guaranteed the companies as net receipts were to be equal to their aggregate net receipts for 1913, subject to a deduction amounting to one-fourth of the first general bonus.

Subsequently the Government made a concession in a supplementary agreement providing for the payment to the railways as from August 4, 1914, of interest at the rate of 4 per cent upon capital expended upon new works that have been brought into use since December 31, 1912.

In Great Britain the Government not only guaranteed a reasonable per cent on the money invested in the railroads after the beginning of the war but it extended its guaranty back to the 1st of January, 1913, or December 31, 1912.

Early in 1916 the Government made a concession and acknowledged its liability in respect of such maintenance work as in the ordinary course of events would have been undertaken, but which, owing to the war, was being deferred. The Government finally conceded its liability not only for what the deferred maintenance work would cost at ordinary prices but for the probable increased cost of the work occasioned by higher prices of labor and material.

Thus it is to be seen that the agreement is not fully stated when it is merely expressed as a guaranty of the income for 1913, the Government in effect guaranteeing a much larger sum. The agreement was understood by the public to guarantee the net receipts of the railroads for the year 1913, and it was regarded by the railroads as liberal for the reason that 1913 had been a "banner year," marking "the high level of prosperity" in railroad operations.

The Government of the United States contemplates taking in this bill as the basis of its standard return the average annual railway operating income for a three-year period, which embraces one lean and two fat years as to railroad operations. The Government of Great Britain based its standard return, if you will call it that, upon the net income for the most profitable year the railroads of Great Britain had ever known. This guaranty resulted in a falling off of dividends as to the 25 principal railroads of Great Britain.

As to the average dividend paid in 1913 by these railways—and I am talking now only of the 25 principal railways of Great Britain; as to other roads, I have not the figures, except as they are embraced in the table presented this morning by the Senator from Iowa, which I assume to be correct—but speaking now of the average dividends for the 25 principal railways of Great Britain, the average paid in 1913 is said to have been 5.06; in 1914, 4.65; in 1915, 4.60; and in 1916, 4.65 per cent. The reduction in dividends was due in part, at least, or in some cases, to the necessity for strengthening reserves.

While the net receipts of the 25 companies in 1916 show a marked advance over the preceding year the dividends paid were substantially the same, the increase in net receipts being absorbed by increasing the reserve.

Notwithstanding that the prices of British railway stocks had fallen off during the four-year period preceding the war and were unusually low during the conflict the prices of these stocks have substantially declined since the summer of 1914.

Considering the fact that the British railroads are capitalized at approximately $300,000, while American railroads are capitalized at something like $62,000 per mile, and having in mind the further facts that British railroads have long been standardized, and that interest and dividends are considerably lower in Great Britain than in the United States, no fundamental objection in principle can be urged against the plan in this bill to guarantee the average annual operating income for the three-year period ended June 30, 1917, as compared with the British plan guaranteeing the net receipts of the railways for 1913 with certain modifications.

Every Senator understands that under our Constitution the power of Congress does not extend to the determination of the question of the amount of just compensation and that no provision of law can deprive the owners of railroad property of the right to have a judicial determination of the amount due them. We can impose increased burdens of taxation, and if the war continues this will probably occur. However much we may admire the spirit of liberality and however anxious we may be to encourage all persons and all industries to voluntarily contribute to the common welfare in this period of emergency, we can not require the owners of property to devote it to the public use for less than its actual value. Our obligation under the Constitution is to provide for the payment of such sums as will reimburse the owners of the property for the injury which they will sustain by reason of the Government use of their properties.

The maximum which the railroads claim would be the receipts for 1917. Their representatives have insisted that the standard of compensation as proposed is unfair and inequitable in that it is based upon the operating revenues for the year 1915, which was undoubtedly an abnormal and unprofitable year as to railroad operations. Nineteen sixteen and seventeen were very profitable years. It would be of great value to the railroads to be relieved from the possibility of misfortune and a consequent loss of revenues and the decline in the value of their securities. And to obtain this boon they should, of course, be willing to relinquish some part of the maximum claim which might be asserted.

It seems clear that while the standard of compensation authorized in this bill permits a reasonable and generous latitude to the President in making agreements with the railroads, it will also give him the power to safeguard the public against injustice and extortion in individual cases where to grant the maximum might prove excessive. The President will not make agreements which he regards as subservient of the public interest and the discretion to refuse to enter into an agreement and thus to remit the carriers to the courts for remedy will enable him to make adequate provision for the protection of the public interest in exceptional cases which Congress can not take notice of because of lack of time and the necessary information.

That I understand is the policy of the Director General.

Mr. President, repeatedly during the course of his remarks, the Senator from Iowa referred to the fact that the question as to what compensation shall be paid to the railroads by the Government for the taking and use of their property during the period of Federal control will be and must be finally determined in another forum. He suggested in his remarks to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that the Senator from Missouri would have an opportunity to answer to the people of Missouri and the people of the United States for his consenting to this guarantee of the standard return.

Mr. President, questions as to what constitutes due compensation are not under our system of Government tried by elections. The Senator from Iowa is a great lawyer, and he knows that they are not. Questions as to what constitutes due compensation under the Constitution of the United States are determinable in the courts of the country. The Senator from Iowa ought not to try to intimidate Senators in the discharge of their duties in attempting to arrange a fair provision for agreement by threatening them with carrying this subject into politics.

But I say to the Senator from Iowa that I think he is wrong. I think he is insisting on writing into this bill terms authorizing an agreement that will not be accepted. I think if the standard he proposes be written into the law the whole subject will be made the matter of litigation.

So far as I am concerned, I think I am doing right, and I am ready to accept his challenge whenever he throws the gauntlet before me. It would be unfair to submit in an election the question of just compensation to voters who have to pay that compensation. There is not a judge, there is not a lawyer in the world who would not recoil with amazement from such a suggestion.

I propose in this instance to do my duty as I see it to the public, and I think I am doing that when I am arranging for them to receive transportation during this war period for less than it would cost them during a time of peace, notwithstanding the fact that the cost of materials has risen and that the labor wage has risen and will continue to rise. Under the terms of this agreement the public will receive transportation for less than they were paying before the war began, and that is the answer to the argument of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I have listened to the Senator's argument with a great deal of interest, but it seems to me that it assumes that all of the great roads or railroad systems that are to be taken over by the Government have been profitable within the years that are fixed as the standard for just compensation.

Mr. ROBINSON. No.

Mr. THOMAS. What I want to ask the Senator is his view as to the effect of this proposed standard of compensation upon railroads or railroad companies which in this interval were either in the hands of receivers or operated without any profit whatever.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in reply to the question of the Senator from Colorado, I will state that there is a provision in the bill which authorizes the President to make any agreement he chooses in case he finds that the condition of any nondividend-paying carrier, as the bill is now written, was so exceptional during the whole or a substantial portion of the three-year period by reason of nonoperation, receivership, or the fact that the investments in property were not fairly reflected in the operating revenue or for any other abnormal cause. The provision is very broad. If the President finds that by reason of any of those things the standard of return provided for in the bill is plainly inequitable as a means of just compensation to such roads, he is, I say, authorized to make any agreement that he chooses with that road.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not recall that provision in the copy of the bill which I have.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is in the bill, I say to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not questioning that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will read it.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not recall it in the copy of the bill that I read last night.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is on page 5 of the bill, commencing with line 1, and I will read it:

> If the President shall find that the condition of any nondividend-paying carrier was during all or a substantial portion of the period of three years ended June 30, 1917, because of nonoperation, receivership, or where recent expenditures for additions or improvements or equipment were—

I read it "were"; it is printed in the bill "when"— > not fully reflected in the net operating railway income of the said three years or a substantial portion thereof, or other undeveloped or abnormal conditions, so exceptional as to make the basis of earnings, hereinabove provided for, plainly inequitable as a fair measure of just compensation, then the President may make with the carrier such agreement for such amount as just compensation as under the circumstances of the particular case he shall find just.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The paragraph just read by the Senator from Arkansas relates only to nondividend-paying carriers, and gives the President with regard to those railroads the authority to pay more than the standard return described in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. And also the authority to pay less.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was intended to give him the authority to pay more.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; certainly; or to pay something where nothing had been received during the three-year period.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. ROBINSON. Those that have not been in operation, of course, would not have any standard return.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to that; I think that is a very wise provision, because there are many railroads concerning which the standard return would not be just compensation. I think that all were convinced of that; and my remarks, of course, were devoted entirely to the other class of railroads.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that that is the reason that I have laid no emphasis on the provision to which the Senator from Colorado has referred. I, too, was confining my remarks principally to the provision the Senator from Iowa discussed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. While the Senator is on that subject, I should like to inquire, if some road should not come under the provision the Senator has read, but still was paying a dividend that was so small that anybody could see that it was inadequate, what provision does the bill make for payment in such a case; for instance, if a road, instead of being a nondividend-paying road, is paying 1 per cent, which everyone concedes is not enough?

Mr. ROBINSON. No roads have done that. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the record does not disclose that there are any roads within that class. The committee proceeded upon the theory that the railroads might very well be divided into two classes in respect to dividends, namely, dividend-paying roads; that is, those roads which pay what is called a regular dividend and nondividend-paying roads—roads which do not pay any regular dividend.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, there is no purpose on the part of the committee in this proposed legislation to transmute a road which pays an irregular and a small dividend into a regular dividend-paying road, or, at least, to give that road the same compensation as would be given to roads that had been making large earnings and had been paying dividends in a regular way?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, certainly not. The clause that I have just read, in response to the question of the Senator from Colorado, was designed to meet cases where the subject matter would have to be litigated, unless some provision of that sort were inserted. There are many roads, for instance, that were not operated for a substantial portion of the three-year period. There are others that are just beginning operations; there are a number that have been in receiverships, where the standard would not be applicable for many reasons that are recognized, and the purpose of the provision is to enable the President to agree with the roads that are in an exceptional class and that can not for one reason or another accept the standard return. Of course, as to a road that has been operating at a loss, if such there be, the Government, if it takes the property, would have to pay something, and the President is given the power to determine that.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think, before the Senator from Arkansas passes from the argument in favor of the action of the committee in fixing the standard return, that attention ought to be called to the fact that the statistics show that the standard return we propose to give the roads is practically the return they received under the rates which were in operation before the war began.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have said that; I have argued that at length. I have alleged that the standard return is based upon the revenue that they earned under governmental regulations fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I went into that subject very fully, as I thought.

Mr. KING. The Senator did so at the outset of his remarks.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Probably I was diverted for a few moments or was compelled to leave the Chamber for a short while.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think if the Senator will take the trouble to read the portion of the remarks I made while he was out he will find it.

Mr. President, I am very grateful to Senators for the very courteous attention with which they have listened to me concerning this subject. It is a difficult one. If one were to follow his natural disposition, it would probably be to pay the railroads just as little as possible, but, under my oath as a public officer and in consideration of what I conceive to be my duty, I must not attempt willfully to deprive the railroads of what they are entitled to, and at the same time I must not seek to impose upon the public an unfair burden.

The supreme crisis which now confronts civilization will probably be passed within the next six months. Every student must recognize the necessity for marshaling our resources and more forcefully applying our energies. Along almost 500 miles of battle front a conflict will likely soon begin which may determine the fate of civilization.

The railroads of the country are a material and necessary factor in the successful prosecution of this war on the part of the United States. We must operate them during the war under unified control; we must speedily hasten to France the troops and supplies which are necessary to enable us successfully to maintain this combat. This measure is a part of the administration war program. It has been found necessary in the public interest, and the administration and the public await with anxiety the final disposition of this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there are two statements made by the Senator from Arkansas to which I desire to make a very brief reply. He has questioned the propriety of a remark which I made more than once during the course of my argument respecting the character of the issue which we are now settling. I hope the Senator from Arkansas did not understand that I even intimated that a settlement of this question by the courts or through legal proceedings was subject to review in a political forum. I tried to make it very clear that I desired full compensation to be paid to the railway companies, and that the best way in the world to ascertain what that compensation is, or ought to be, was by resort to legal tribunals, and that with the result or with the award that might be made by these tribunals every good citizen of the land must be content, and by them he must abide. The suggestion I made was with regard to agreements concerning compensation, and that presents a political question—not a partisan but a political question. The wisdom or unwisdom of making a particular agreement with the railway companies concerning compensation is one which belongs to the people of this country, and they will finally settle it. I did not assume, of course, that the conclusion reached by any Senator or the vote cast by any Senator would be influenced by anything save his own conscience and his own judgment. I have so high an opinion of the discrimination of the Senator from Arkansas that I wanted to make that distinction perfectly clear. I know that he must appreciate the difference between the two things.

In the second place, he has stated several times that the system of rates under which the earnings of the railway companies of the United States had been accumulated in the last three years is a system of rates established by the Government. I can not concur in that statement; it is, in my judgment, inaccurate. The Government has never established a system of rates; the Government has the power, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, to revise, upon complaint or upon its own motion, rates which have been initiated and established by the carriers. It has no further or other power in that respect, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has not at any time established the generally prevailing rates for the movement of commodities throughout the United States. It has passed from time to time upon complaints, either upon the part of a shipper or some one else interested, upon the reasonableness of certain rates, and it has passed from time to time, upon the application of the railway companies, upon the propriety of an increase in certain rates; but it is not accurate to declare that the rates which have been established and which have been effective in the United States have been established by the judgment of the Government. They have been established by the judgment of the carriers, subject only to revision, under proper circumstances, by the commission.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present in the form of a petition a short editorial appearing in the Washington Evening Star regarding woman suffrage. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD, to be considered in connection with that important subject when the resolution providing for the submission of the national amendment is before the Senate for final action.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOVING TOWARD SUFFRAGE.

Both of the national committees having declared in favor of Federal woman suffrage, the two parties stand aligned on this issue on equal terms. The other day the executive committee of the Democratic Party voted 5 to 2 in favor of suffrage, while a poll of the full national committee showed 28 for and 14 against the Anthony amendment and 6 unreported. The Republican national committee at St. Louis has just adopted a resolution virtually to the same effect, commending the votes of those Republican Members of the House who favored the amendment. These declarations must have an effect upon the Senate, which is soon to vote on the proposed constitutional amendment. Converts to the cause are being reported from time to time, though not identified, for the campaigners for the women's cause are shrewd enough to keep their "captures" undisclosed to prevent pressure from the other side. It is known that the situation is very close, and the fact that no move is being made at present to bring the resolution to a vote suggests that its advocates are not quite sure of having yet the necessary two-thirds. Suffrage, however, can not be indefinitely postponed. It is bound to win eventually, so why not now?

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY (H. DOC. NO. 901).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 16, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. William Couden, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Dear God, our loving Father in Heaven, "Thou hast made us for Thyself and our souls are restless until they find their rest in Thee." Comes to us once more the fleeting, precious moment when we are wont to enter into communion with Thee through the gate of prayer. Be it for us a shelter from care and a retreat for peace, cleansing, and preparation. Banish from us our sin, our worldliness, our unbelief. Grant unto us in the stress of many conflicts and the clamor of many voices serenity of spirit and steadfastness to truth. Keep ever before us the cross of Christ, the sign of his sacrifice and triumph, the emblem of Thy love for us, the measure of our value to Thee, the symbol of our possible service to each other, and the mark of our eternal hope. And to-day and all our days, dear Lord, help us "that by the practice of those things we know to be true we may be led forward to a knowledge of those things we can not now comprehend." Through Jesus Christ, our Lord, amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, was received.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will be glad if the House will indulge me not to exceed three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in the Evening Star of yesterday I find the following:

Chairman JOHNSON, in his policy of legislation by slander, has attempted to beat down all criticism or suggested amendment of the details of his bill by slurring sweepingly not only the Star but all Washington real estate men, representing all local landlords, and even his fellow Representatives who had the audacity to attempt to improve his bill. Of the committee representing the Real Estate Brokers' Association, Chairman JOHNSON says: "They and their clients are the profiteers."

I should apply the short and ugly word to that, Mr. Speaker, but I shall refrain from doing so, and simply say that the newspaper maliciously has garbled what I said, and has put me in a position of saying what I did not say. I did not refer in that connection to the Real Estate Brokers' Association, but instead to "real estate men" other than to that association. Further along the newspaper says:

In deprecating a hearing of the association's committee, he says: "Would the gentleman advocate giving burglars and thieves a hearing in preparing laws to stop them from their practices?"

Now, Mr. Speaker, what I did say will be found on page 2112 of the RECORD, and it is this:

But in this instance the Washington Star is confronted by a double question—the Government clerks upon one side, to whom it wishes to sell its papers, and the real estate men upon the other side, from whom it receives hundreds of thousands of dollars every year in the way of pay for advertisements.

Now, what I said referred to the "real estate men" and not to those of the Real Estate Brokers' Association who came to see me about the matter. Concerning the gentlemen who compose the special committee of the Real Estate Brokers' Association I have no word of criticism, but instead words of commendation. Mr. Wardman is one of those gentlemen, and never yet in any of the correspondence that has reached me, or the telephone messages, or people who have come to see me, have I heard anybody charge him for profiteering; but, on the other hand, I have heard people say that he has protested against it, and would not permit people in his apartments to do so. Of Mr. Fairfax I have never heard any criticism. I never heard a word against Mr. Story. On the other hand, I have heard words of praise of him.

If the Star or anybody else has so distorted my remarks or has misunderstood my remarks as reflecting upon any of these gentlemen, I regret it exceedingly. If I have been so unfortunate as to have my remarks susceptible to that sort of construction, I regret that. If, in the excitement of debate, I have said anything reflecting on these gentlemen, I certainly am most sorry for it and apologize to them for it.

Now, there is another place, on page 2124 of the RECORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] was saying:

Now, Mr. Chairman, only one word in closing, and that is this, that the minority of the Committee on the District of Columbia are as sincerely desirous of stopping unfair profiteering in the District of Columbia, or in any other part of the United States, as the majority, or the honorable Representative from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]; but they do not want to pass a bill which they believe is not only unconstitutional, in at least one of its phases, but unworkable, and which will not produce the results which are believed by both sides to be desirable. I therefore believe that one of three courses should be followed in relation to this bill: As no hearings were given and only an hour and a half given to the consideration by the committee, it should be referred back to the committee for reformation, or——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would the gentleman advocate giving burglars and thieves a hearing in preparing laws to stop them from their practices?

There I was simply inquiring whether or not the gentleman would be willing to go beyond the Real Estate Brokers' Association in the hearings, or whether he would consent to let the profiteers come there and take up the time and delay the hearings on the bill. I meant nothing more than that. And yet the Evening Star, in its ugliness, has put me in the attitude of applying that language to the Real Estate Brokers' Association, when I never intended to do so, and the writer of that article knew, when he garbled what I said, that he was doing so for the purpose of misrepresenting me.

NOTIFICATION OF ILLNESS OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 228, to provide notification of illness of soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 228, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in all cases where an enlisted man or officer of the United States Army is admitted to an Army hospital in continental America on account of a dangerous injury or disease, and in all cases of admission for slight illness or injury and the same becomes dangerous after such admission, immediate notice shall be given to the nearest relative of such enlisted man or officer under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as I understood the reporting of the resolution——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the right to object.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). The Clerk read the committee amendment instead of the original resolution.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained, in view of the necessity of getting through with the deficiency appropriation bill to object to the consideration of such matters at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is because I do not want to take time that I am objecting, not because I am hostile to what the gentleman desires.

Mr. REAVIS. If there was any intention of time being taken on the resolution——

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. The Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. The Doorkeeper will close the doors.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 319 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FERRIS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes in reference to a personal matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for not to exceed 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, on what subject?

Mr. FERRIS. I want to make some remarks upon the gentleman's speech of yesterday concerning myself.

Mr. GILLETT. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but I hope that the other side will be as liberal on similar occasions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to say that the gentleman has the right to take the floor as a matter of personal privilege, and, wanting to expedite the consideration of the deficiency bill, I believe this is the best way to do it.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what right he has as a matter of personal privilege?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think clearly under the precedents there is enough there to take at least 20 minutes' time in argument.

Mr. GILLETT. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should have the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I am not ordinarily thin skinned, and I am not thin skinned now. I have a consciousness that I did no wrong in inserting that article, and I have it now. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], the leader on the Republican side, thinks that I made an error in incorporating an editorial in the RECORD of February 4, it being a signed editorial by ex-Gov. Martin H. Glynn, of New York. It was not a fugitive article at all; it was signed at both ends. The headline said it was an editorial by Martin H. Glynn, and it was signed by him at the bottom. That brings the issue squarely. I think I made no mistake. The gentleman thinks I did. I ask that the Clerk, in my time, read the editorial, and then the House can see who is right and who is wrong about it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, that editorial has been printed in the RECORD once, and I ask whether it is fair to have it printed again in this manner?

Mr. FERRIS. It is the only way that we can arrive at what is right and what is wrong. The gentleman says I inserted it wrongfully.

Mr. GILLETT. I said it was objectionable.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman said more than that.

Mr. GILLETT. I should like to know what I said.

Mr. FERRIS. I am very fond of the gentleman, and he has been liberal and generous to the House and he has not been overly partisan unless this is evidence of it, and I think the gentleman will do me the fairness to say that I have not been.

Mr. GILLETT. I agree to that.

Mr. FERRIS. I have as many friends on the Republican side as on the Democratic side, and I am not dealing in petty matters.

Mr. GILLETT. I simply wish to say that I was sorry yesterday to feel obliged to say what I did about the gentleman.

Mr. FERRIS. Let us have the article and we will see who is right.

Mr. GILLETT. I shall not object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, what is the article that is to be read? The same one——

The SPEAKER. The article is an editorial or a circular letter, or something of the sort, written by ex-Gov. Glynn, of New York.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, it is already in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that perfectly well.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If it is already in the RECORD, I object.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman can not object; it is in my own time, and I will not yield further.

Mr. WALSH. He can object.

Mr. FERRIS. I will read it myself.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman can not object to that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. WALSH. That under the rules of the House the gentleman can not read an article written by somebody else in his own time, if objection is made to it.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think that objection is well taken and I do not yield.

Mr. WALSH. I cite Rule XXX.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman from Oklahoma is reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Everybody knows that.

Mr. WALSH. Section 891, Mr. Speaker, on page 423——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want this taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It will not be taken out of the gentleman's time. Will the gentleman cite his authority?

Mr. WALSH. It is a note under Rule XXX.

The reading of papers other than the one on which the vote is about to be taken is usually permitted without question (citing Hinds' Precedents, vol. 5, 5258) and a Member in debate usually reads or has read such papers as he pleases, but this privilege is subject to the authority of the House if another Member objects.

The SPEAKER. On what page is that language?

Mr. WALSH. Section 891.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but what part of the page?

Mr. WALSH. It is a foot note of this section 891, at the beginning of the paragraph of section 891. It further says:

This principle applies even to the Member's own written speech or a report which he proposes to have read in his own time or to read in his place.

I submit, now, that if objection is made——

The SPEAKER. The question is to be decided by vote of the House without debate whether this paper be read or not. Shall it be read?

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GILLETT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 137, noes 101.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the article.

The Clerk began the reading of the article.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want my request read, too, so it will show all the proceedings that there occurred.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS extended his remarks by inserting the following:

IT BECOMETH AND BEHOOVETH MR. WADSWORTH, MR. LODGE, MR. CHAMBERLAIN, MR. ROOSEVELT, AND ALL THEIR PHONOGRAPHIC CULT TO CHIRP LIKE A CRICKET, NOT ROAR LIKE A LION.

[An editorial by former Gov. Martin H. Glynn, of New York, in the Times-Union, Albany, N. Y., Jan. 28, 1918.]

To-day the people of this country can be divided into two camps.

Those who wanted war at any price.

And those who hoped for peace, if peace could be maintained without the sacrifice of national honor.

Now, we are at war and we have the astonishing anomaly of the leaders of the "war buzzards" trying to gnaw the vitals out of our Commander in Chief, while the great majority of those who stood for peace while peace spelled honor are upholding the President's hands as Aaron and Hur upheld the hands of Moses in his battle with Amalek.

The present volcanic attack against the war policies of President Wilson is no haphazard incident. It is a well-laid plot, nicely trained and strategically timed. Its purpose, no matter how secretive its sponsors, how insinuating its methods, how seductive its arguments, is to give the Republican Party a majority in the next House of Representatives and to pave the way for a Republican President in 1920. From a political point of view this may be tolerable; from a patriotic aspect, in a national crisis like this, it is odious and detestable.

The business of the Nation to-day is to win the war, and the political leaders, who for party gain or personal aim lay the slightest obstacle in the way of the happy consummation of this business, clothe themselves in a diabolical livery and surround their political machinations with a brimstone scent, a sulphurous odor offensive to the people who revere patriotism in politics but abhor politics in patriotism.

For months Col. Roosevelt has been injecting politics into the war through his articles in the Kansas City Star and Metropolitan Magazine. With craft and caution he has planted a bomb, intended to blow President Wilson out of political existence, and in this "Guy Fawkes" plot he has had the unctuous assistance of Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, and the crafty support of Senator WADSWORTH, of New York. But cunning and unctuousness can not win a contest like this. The mountain of truth is too big to be discolored by such daubing brushes, the facts too potent to be minimized by impish dissimulation or distorted by cunning castigation.

The Bible says he who draws the sword shall perish by the sword. Well. Roosevelt and his followers first drew the political sword in this dispute, and with their assumptive valor they should not cry for quarter before the blade of their own rapier.

For 16 years before the present Democratic administration the Republican Party was the custodian of the welfare of this Nation, and in all these 16 years it did but little to put this country on a basis of adequate preparation for war. Grover Cleveland started the American Navy on its way to imperial strength, but Theodore Roosevelt, as President of the United States, inaugurated a naval program that curtailed the Cleveland policy. Great as our Navy is to-day, it would be far greater still if the policy of Cleveland had prevailed and the plans of Roosevelt buried in the bottom of the sea. And as it was with the Navy, so was it with the Army, for Theodore Roosevelt left the Army of the United States weaker than he had found it seven years before.

No sooner, however, had Woodrow Wilson, with his panoramic view of the history of the world in peace time and in war time, his thorough knowledge of Democratic aspirations and economic possibilities, his sympathy with the masses and his consideration of the classes—no sooner had he become President of the United States than the wheels of progress were set in motion to equip this Nation as years before she should have been equipped for the solution of pressing national problems and the handling of contingencies of an international nature.

The rehearsal of all the legislation of President Wilson to carry out this progressive program would be superfluous here. The world knows it by heart. It insures him a splendid place in the annals of statesmanship. It is the unmistakable triumph of the democratic yearning with which the heart of mankind throbs and pulses to-day. And it carried Woodrow Wilson to wonderful victory in 1916 against an avalanche of money and a labyrinth of intrigue.

[Laughter on Republican side.]

His Federal reserve-bank law, which Mulhall, the famous English economist, said was of more worth to the world than the Panama Canal, saved this country, with the advent of the war, from the most stupendous panic in history and enabled us to ride the tumultuous waters of "world-war" finance with hardly a squeak or a tremor of our old ship of state. Without this Federal reserve bank to-day the United States would be grinding and pounding on the rocks of disaster.

Nor is this all.

From a vision almost prophetic came the Federal revenue bill which wrung a lordly portion of governmental revenue from internal taxes instead of from tariff imposts which under the baneful influence of war dwindled to a sum insufficient to provide lubrication for our gears of Government, let alone provide fuel for the Treasury boiler that makes the wheels of national life go round.

Our national experience since the war started must carry conviction to every fair-minded American that for these two measures alone we owe an ineffable debt of gratitude to the wisdom and statesmanship of Woodrow Wilson.

And of our military realm we have the self-same tale.

Theodore Roosevelt may indulge himself in all the weird juggling of language that pleases his fancy; he may insensate himself in such inspirational riot of emotional frenzy as may give fire to his tongue and flare to his imagination; but the fact remains undeniable, ineffaceable, irremovable, that in two years of ante bellum days Woodrow Wilson did more to put our Army and our Navy on a footing of war than both William Howard Taft and Theodore Roosevelt did in the whole 11 years of their supine reign.

[Laughter on Republican side.]

During these two years preparedness for a possible war was pushed by President Wilson as fast as the sentiment of the country would permit and quite as fast as even the most violent of his present-day critics then deemed expedient or politic.

Suddenly, however, conditions created by the autocratic dogmatism of Germany disregarding treaties and throwing promises to the winds, hurled us into the seething whirlpool of war. Then the very men who had been at the helm of the ship of state for 16 years, the men whose policies had weakened the Army and stunted the Navy, began to howl because we could not equip a million men overnight and put them in the trenches of France in a day. They forgot the experience of England; they forgot the experience of France; they forgot their own neglect of our martial strength; they forgot everything but their own personal advertisement and their own political advancement.

Mythology tells us that Minerva sprang full-armed from the mind of Jupiter, and despite the fact that the age for mythological miracles has passed, these acrimonious critics demanded that the United States whittle rifles out of the air and by some sort of prestidigitorial art transform a million civilians into full-trained soldiers between the sinking and the rising of the sun. What these critics had failed to do in 16 years, they insist that Woodrow Wilson should do in 16 days. The wind listeth in the night, the dew falls, the stars come out, the moon works her magic charm, and behold at dawn a full-grown mushroom whitens the lawn where at sunset only an embryonic stalk snuggled in the grass. This is the kind of marvel, this the kind of impossible legerdemain that Col. Roosevelt and his school demand should be duplicated in our military world. They demand that an invincible Army be created overnight out of wind and dew, starlight and moonshine. But they fail to provide the Aladdin's lamp with which to work the miracle; they fail to furnish the necromantic art wherewith to ram into a night the task of a decade.

And this miracle, too, they demand in the teeth of the hoary-headed truth that from the days of Washington, Franklin, and Adams this Nation has set its face against a militaristic policy. A large Army, a potential Military Establishment, has been the ghost that has given this country sleepless nights for 140 years—a factitious ghost, perhaps; but nevertheless a ghost hypnotic in its influence and awesome in its sway. And the Navy, too, has been hampered by a short-sighted sentiment of the great interior part of the country whose congressional Representatives persistently opposed large naval appropriations from fear of retrenchment against the "home-town" projects of their own native heaths. For this ingrained repugnance to a big Army, an adequate Navy, neither the Republicans of to-day or the Democrats of to-day are to blame. The fault lies at the door of the predominant sentiment of the Nation since 1776. And as we have sown; so to-day we reap.

Gen. Winfield Scott, one of the world's greatest soldiers, compressed an historic situation in a nutshell when he said, "Republics are never prepared for war."

The business of Republics is peace; the business of autocracies is war.

Autocracy lives by the sword. The father and grandfather of Frederick the Great said so; Frederick himself said so; and so saith the Kaiser, and the Crown Prince, too.

A love and a craving for peace, however, form the very genesis of a republic. To this genesis republics are true; from this genesis republics depart only at the call of honor or the command of necessity.

Hence it is, though critics may forget, the people remember, that in eight months of war the United States, under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, has done twice as much, and even more, than England and France did in the corresponding period of time. The accusations, the exaggerations, the fabrications, the distortions of supercilious censors and envious-fanged contemners of the Wilsonian policies wear such a flimsy gossamer covering as to expose this political plot in all its naked hideousness.

We make no claim that the administration has created sunbeams out of cucumbers or performed feats beyond the pale of human possibility, but we do maintain that its efforts have ben amazing, its accomplishments beyond compare in the history of modern warfare.

We have not whipped the Kaiser yet, but we will whip him if calumniating critics do not dampen the fires of enthusiasm or grease the tracks whereon must ride our national chariots of war. We have more men in France to-day than Roosevelt knows or Germany suspects, and a million more are waiting for the ships.

We have an Army so well cared for that the death rate in our ranks for the four months ending January 1, 1918, averaged only 7.5 per thousand—a death rate, mind you, less than the death rate for men of a like age in peaceful avocations at home. Compare this with the death rate of 20.14 per thousand under the good old Republican rule of the days of the Spanish-American War. Compare these figures, and then applaud the Roosevelt charges if you can!

True, we have made some mistakes, but in the magnitude of our undertaking some mistakes were inevitable, unavoidable. In balance though with the wondrous achievements these mistakes have been trivial and not worthy of the attention of the men who minimize their talents by trying to magnify molehills into mountains.

And furthermore, unlike the Spanish-American War, in which Mr. Roosevelt was a king-pin:

We have no Army contract scandals.

We have no embalmed-beef horrors.

[Laughter on Republican side.]

We have no fat old generals going to war in carriages and leading battle charges from easy rocking chairs.

We have no unpleasant gossip about the appointment of political generals and society admirals.

[Laughter on Republican side.]

We have no round-robin letters from presumptuous and inferior officers demoralizing discipline and exalting self.

In the face of these facts the wild rantings of Roosevelt and his fellow political conspirators are boomerangs, pestilential to the ears and revolting to the sensibilities of others, but harmful only to the men who hurl them. On the estimation of thoughtful people these critics make no indelible impression. They may ruffle the surface of the pool of comment, but they stir not the depths of public opinion. And with Roosevelt, Lodge, and Wadsworth as the chief creators of this curtain of camouflage political fire, fed by the tissues of ambitious misrepresentation, fanned by the sinister winds of political oratory, there stalks forth from memory's closet the skeleton of Alger's embalmed beef with its concomitant stench; there looms into view the commander of the United States forces in Cuba, too fat to ride a horse, going into battle in a carriage, and lolloping in a portable bathtub while our soldiers had no medicines to conquer tropic ills; there looms into view this self-same commander of the United States forces in Cuba fighting his battles from the sensuous folds of a soporific hammock, while through the stupidity and carelessness of an inefficient military medical force our soldier boys found typhoid fever more deadly than bullets from the Spanish guns.

And so, in view of these verities which no political manipulation can snatch from history's page; in view of the official funeral-hued glories and the official scarlet-tinged scandals of the Spanish-American War; in view of Alger's embalmed beef of odoriferous memory; in view of inferior ships purchased by the Government at superior prices; in view of the stigma and disgrace that typhoid fever killed more of our soldiers than Spanish bullets sent to their graves; in view of the cable which Dewey cut to save the Navy from the malefic influence of Republican politics at Washington; in view of Army contracts which brought a blush to the cheek and rage to the heart of the Nation; in view of the attempt to deprive Schley of his share of glory in the Santiago victory; in view of the papier-mâché generals created as a sort of "iron-cross" reward for services rendered the good old Republican Party on many a bloodless field of politics; in view, in fine, of the bathos and the pathos of flagrant Republican mismanagement in the Spanish-American War, it becometh and behooveth Mr. Wadsworth, Mr. Lodge, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Roosevelt, and all their phonographic cult to chirp like a cricket, not roar like a lion.

MARTIN H. GLYNN.

[Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not yield, and I want to say two or three words——

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not yield.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not addressing the gentleman.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is using my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman had 20 minutes and the gentleman has used 23 minutes in reading the article, according to the clock. I do not object to the gentleman's having all the time he wants, but he has used 23 minutes in reading the article.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman has forgotten that there was some time consumed outside of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was a certain amount of time taken in a wrangle that has to be deducted from the accurate time.

Mr. FORDNEY. But, Mr. Speaker, that time was not consumed out of any portion of the 23 minutes that the Clerk consumed in reading the article. I do not object to giving the gentleman all the time he wants, but 23 minutes was consumed in reading the article by the Clerk, according to the clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma has three minutes remaining.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I did not keep the time, and I assume the Chair kept the time correctly, as he always does. I want to say that on February 4, in the regular way, standing right over there, after speaking to the leader of my party on my side about it, I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks, which was granted, by printing that article. Now, that is a partisan article, of course——

SEVERAL MEMBERS (on the Republican side). Oh, no!

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, well, I did not expect the Republican side to approve of what I am saying; neither did I expect them to approve that article.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not. From the plaudits or jeers made to the article, I do not expect to have their approval.

I am merely trying to state the history. I asked it in the usual way; it was carried in the usual way. I handed it to the Clerk in the usual way, and it was printed in the usual way, and I am very sorry that the Republican Party are getting so thin-skinned that they can not admit of an article printed as an editorial, not a fugitive article, but a signed article, by the ex-governor of the Empire State of the Republic, who has been a Member of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I stated yesterday, and I repeat to-day, that I regretted very much to offer any criticism of the gentleman from Oklahoma, whom I have always respected. The criticism I made, and which he has not in the slightest answered, was that in this branch of Congress, where both sides of the House have during this war absolutely, so far as I know, ignored politics, have tried to put aside partisanship, and have by their speeches and their actions worked together, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] for the first time printed an article which I do not believe any man on that side would have gotten up and read as his own, and thus for the first time he projected partisanship into the proceedings of this House. That was what I objected to in the matter. I said as an editorial it was all right, but as a speech on this floor I thought it was objectionable.

The gentleman has not been quite candid with the House in what he has just said.

Mr. FERRIS. State where I am uncandid.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman says that he asked in the ordinary way. The gentleman first got up a few days before he finally received permission to print and asked permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], reserving the point of order, asked him on what subject, and the gentleman said:

I want to print a short editorial on the war—peace and against war.

You gentlemen have heard the "short" editorial.

Mr. FERRIS. That was several days prior.

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly. It was the same editorial, was it not?

Mr. FERRIS. It was the same editorial.

Mr. GILLETT. And, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was refused consent to print that "short" editorial on "Peace and against war." Then, a few days later, after he had discussed a question before this House, he got up, when the House was about to adjourn, and asked unanimous consent again.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman certainly does not want to do an unkind thing. He is the leader of too great a party to do that.

Mr. GILLETT. I want to present the facts fairly to the House.

Mr. FERRIS. I have the RECORD right here. I had made no speech of any sort, except to help get through some little bills from the Public Lands Committee two or three hours prior to that.

Mr. GILLETT. It may have been; but it was that afternoon.

Mr. FERRIS. How can the gentleman attach any importance or any relation to a general request to extend remarks? It had no relation in my mind or in fact. There were three or four hours between the request and when I had said a word. It was not a set speech in any sense. I was helping to get through some little bills.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman says he did not think of it, I acquit him of it.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. GILLETT. As you all know, on this side of the House it has been the custom that objection is made unless we know of the subject; but you know, when a man has been making a speech, even if it was delivered before the House an hour before, it is customary to assume that the gentleman is seeking to extend his remarks on that speech, and, I venture to say, that was the reason no objection was made.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I read the gentleman's remarks, and he is repeating what he said in his speech, that I had made anything like a speech——

Mr. GILLETT. You did.

Mr. FERRIS. No; I did not. I replied only to some remarks about some Oregon bill. I had no interest in it, except getting through some little bills from my committee. What the gentleman says might be true if I had really made a speech, but I did not want to make any remarks on those little bills. I cared nothing about them. I was merely answering questions and making a few short statements to help others with their bills.

Mr. GILLETT. I acquit the gentleman from any purpose of intent to deceive the House, but I do think that was what prevented this House from objecting. I wish to ask the gentleman if he considers that a short editorial, and if he considers "Peace against war" a fair description of it?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me read. The facts do not hurt anybody. I will just say, in a word, if it came from anybody else but the gentleman I would not have paid any attention to it. I do not want to be considered thin-skinned about these matters. I have such regard for the gentleman that a statement like his speech yesterday really touched me a little, and I think I am justified in consuming a few moments of time.

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly; and I wish to give the gentleman an opportunity.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman goes back and finds where on February 1 I asked unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have five minutes more. I used some of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. The first time I asked this permission was, on page 1692 of the RECORD, on February 1, just before the adjournment. This is what I said:

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

He objects to all extensions of remarks.

Mr. GILLETT. He objects to extensions and putting in extraneous matter. That is not a fair statement. He does not object to all.

Mr. FERRIS. I read further:

Mr. FERRIS. I want to print a short editorial on the war—peace and against war.

There is a dash there, after "war." Then, after that, it says "peace and against war." I do not recall saying the last, although I may have said it. But that editorial is on the war. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think that that is a fair characterization?

Mr. FERRIS. It is what you are trying to forget, I expect. That is all in that place there. Now, three or four days later, on February 4, just before adjournment and after the day's proceedings had expired, this happened:

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There is nothing clandestine and nothing mysterious about that. It is simply the usual course; nothing more, nothing less.

I read further:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS extended his remarks by inserting the following.

I did not even express approval or disapproval of the article, so that I can not understand why the gentleman should object. [Laughter.] I could express approval in part now. In the midst of jeers over there I will do it.

Mr. GILLETT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit it to the candid judgment of this House—to that side of the House as well as this side of the House—whether it was candid on the part of the gentleman. And, by the way, I have now been shown the remarks which the gentleman made on that day, which consumed nearly a column of the RECORD, which he thought amounted to so little.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no; it is not a column.

Mr. GILLETT. It is more than half a column of the RECORD on that same day when the gentleman made the request and it was granted.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is not fair in that assumption or right in the facts.

Mr. GILLETT. There it is, on page 1674.

Mr. FERRIS. On a bill from my committee, responding to a criticism by Dr. FOSTER, two or three hours before this request was made.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman is mistaken on that. On page 1674 that appears, and he made his request on page 1678.

Mr. FERRIS. There are five pages intervening.

Mr. GILLETT. Four or five pages. Now, as to these details, Mr. Speaker, I think the House is fully master of the situation, and therefore I submit——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. GILLETT. I submit it to the candid judgment of both sides of the House whether that was not an objectionable editorial, and whether the gentleman's manner in making the request for the publication of "a short editorial on peace and war" was fair and candid to this House. [Applause.]

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9867) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9867, the urgent deficiency bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buildings: For repairs and improvements to school buildings and grounds and for repairing and renewing heating, plumbing, and ventilating apparatus, and installation of sanitary drinking fountains in buildings not supplied with same, $20,000.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask whether these increased expenses in the public schools were brought about by the increased number of pupils, caused by the increased number of the floating population in Washington?

Mr. SHERLEY. There were a couple of items, generally speaking, in which that was a factor. The one that has just been read grew out of the extra cost of the repairs that had been authorized.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. There were a number of items grouped together in large sums.

Mr. SHERLEY. A good deal of that was due to fuel. The increased cost of fuel and the increased amount of fuel has greatly increased the expense of running the schools.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Is there any rule or restriction as to a boy or girl attending the schools? Must they reside here a certain number of weeks?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a rule or provision of law against attendance unless pupils are residents for a certain number of weeks, but we did not go into that.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I was wondering whether it was on account of the increase of pupils.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was the case in a number of items—one or two of them—but, broadly speaking, that was not a determining factor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters, seacoast defenses: For construction of temporary barracks and quarters at seacoast posts for the accommodation of officers and enlisted men of the Coast Artillery, including heating and lighting apparatus, water and sewer systems, plumbing, roads, walks, wharves, and drainage, $3,565,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, in reference to this item and various other items throughout the bill for construction purposes I would like to make some inquiry as to whether the committee has any information regarding the methods under which those contracts for construction have been let. This matter has been called to my attention in correspondence, as it has been called to the attention of all, I think, in the press, that the large plants are being constructed principally by a few large contractors. The method is on the cost-plus principle, which, as I understand from builders, is the simplest in the world and the easiest to make money out of, in that the contractor himself takes absolutely no responsibility. There is a limit, of course, in the construction of the cantonments as to the amount the contractor should make out of one job, but if you follow the line of those various contracts it appears that comparatively few contractors have these jobs, in spite of the large number of buildings recently constructed.

I am credibly informed that even concerns are granted contracts that did not exist at the time of making the contract and go so far as to organize after the contract is let to a few individuals. At the present time nearly all construction throughout the country is stopped other than for governmental purposes. Where we find that formerly a large number of bids were offered in competition for contracts those concerns have practically been put out of business by the fact that all interest centers on Government construction.

Now, it seems to me that, in fairness to the maintenance of business arrangements throughout the country, these other concerns—I believe possibly not as large as those to whom the contracts have been let, yet nevertheless fully capable of carrying on such work as the construction of these temporary buildings—ought to have a chance.

Therefore I would like to know under what supervision those contracts are let, what the conditions are, who controls them, and why the smaller bidder does not have the same opportunity to get contracts under this cost-plus method as some of the largest concerns. You can probably count on the fingers of one hand the actual concerns doing the business. They may do it under some subsidiary company and get a different title, but nevertheless there are few very large corporations with great financial backing that are actually controlling this rapid construction on the part of the Government. Therefore I think it perfectly right and proper that the committee should have some information as to who actually lets these contracts. I have known of men coming here trying to get information about specifications, and they have been shuffled around from one board to another, from one place to another, from one man to another, without meeting anyone in a responsible position who would actually give them the desired information. I am not offering this in the line of criticism, but I do think it is a matter on which we ought to have information.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, there is no difficulty about the gentleman or anybody else having the information who takes the trouble to read the hearings previously had and printed and the present printed hearings. There has been much talk and much misinformation and much criticism with little reason about the waste and cost and excessive profits that have been made in connection with the building of cantonments.

The gentleman will find on pages 474 and 475 of the hearings tables setting out the exact amount of money paid to contractors for building the various cantonments and camps. You will find in the hearings of last fall the exact form in detail of the contract under which the work was performed. You will find that for the cantonments the percentage of fee paid runs all the way from 3.67 per cent, which I think is the maximum, to 2.20, which I believe is the minimum, an average of 2.84 per cent for the cantonments. For the camps the average was 6.88. For embarkation camps it was 3.11, 4.07, 6, 7.06, and 7 per cent. No contractor for any work received a fee in excess of $250,000.

Now, I have no doubt it is true that there have been a limited number of contractors, though the number is very much greater than three or four or five, which would be what you could count on one hand, and the reason for that is perfectly patent. The doing of this work was more important than the distributing of it among our various constituents. It was infinitely more important to get the work done than that contractors located here, there, or elsewhere should get the job; and men charged with the responsibility of getting work of great magnitude done within a very restricted time would naturally turn to and seek out those men of sufficient magnitude and reputation to be a guarantee of the work being done, men who had existing organizations capable of being expanded quickly to take care of this character of work. The fact that the work has been done in the time in which it has been done is pretty good evidence of the wisdom of that policy. This, I think, is likely to be true touching the new work, that where the department has found a contractor who has made good, who has done work promptly, efficiently, and economically, the natural inclination will be to give that man, with a going organization, contracts for doing work of the same type, rather than to go through the process of educating a new contractor and a new organization.

The gentleman asked about 18 questions in five minutes and I am trying to cover them in five minutes. The contracts are let through the Quartermaster's Department, and the construction has been under the direct charge of former Col. Littell, now Gen. Littell, of the United States Army. He has been advised from time to time——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman state the personnel of those who let the contracts?

Mr. SHERLEY. The man who is responsible is Gen. Littell.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is he the person who lets the contracts?

Mr. SHERLEY. He is, as I understand it; but he has been advised in the past by a subsidiary committee under the Council of National Defense. I can not state from memory, but the gentleman will find in the hearings of last fall a full statement as to that fact.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is an independent committee outside of the War Department?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is not an independent committee outside of the War Department. It is a committee under the Council of National Defense.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what I meant.

Mr. SHERLEY. But there are representatives of the War Department on that committee as I recall.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I wanted to get was the personnel of the board which lets the contracts.

Mr. SHERLEY. All of that was gone into at great length last year, because there was a great deal of criticism about it, and the statements were made that contractors were going to make exorbitant profits, and among other things the statement was made that it was excessive to pay 10 per cent, and the assumption was that 10 per cent would be the amount. In point of fact in connection with the cantonments, which constituted the big work, the percentage on the average was less than 3 per cent, and I doubt if work has ever been done anywhere of that magnitude on a percentage basis lower than what is shown to have been the actual result in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Debate on this motion under the rules of the committee has been exhausted.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to speak in opposition to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] some time ago made quite an extensive speech in support of the project for a budget system. While I am inclined to favor this project I do not think it will do away with deficiency bills or bills of this character. In times of war like these inevitably emergencies will arise without the fault of either the committee or the Government. It will be impossible in advance to prepare for all of these emergencies which through the exigencies of war come upon us. So we have this large deficiency bill at this time. I might, however, make one suggestion which I think would have something to do with reducing the amount of deficiencies in the future, and that is in the line of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts who spoke a moment ago [Mr. TREADWAY].

Contractors who come here have the greatest difficulty in many instances in finding where the man is to whom they should submit their bids or their proposals. The consequence is that, not being able to find out where these proposals should be submitted, contracts are made on the open market by Government officials, or perhaps made with some kind of competitive bidding, but very much above the price at which other parties were willing to furnish the same or even better goods. The engineers' office here, or at least one branch of the engineers, has a most excellent system in that respect. It posts up in the offices, upon a large board, where anybody can plainly see it, the prices which it has been paying for articles and the articles which it needs and ought to have, and for which it seeks prices in the future. Under this system it could list bids which would be obtainable of the articles or goods desired and the prices heretofore paid by the various Government departments, which in a number of instances, I have found, has been up far above the market price; not intentionally, perhaps, but because they did not come in contact with all the parties ready to furnish the articles and desirous of furnishing them if they only knew to whom they could go.

I learned only the other day that a gentleman who wanted a contract for making detonators for fuses, as an instance of how the departments are coordinated, after being shoved around from pillar to post, found who was thought to be the proper man to submit bids to, and that man told him that the Government had no need for anything of the kind; that the contracts had all been let. He went away, but afterwards saw a business man of his acquaintance, who told him that he was sure there had been a mistake, and upon going around he found another official, who told him that that was just what they needed and had to have, and what they were willing to pay a good price for.

Matters of this kind are inevitable as long as there is so much haste in furnishing articles for which the need is great. But, at the same time, if some system was adopted whereby it would be easy for parties to come here and find the articles they wanted and what prices the department would pay, a great amount would be saved to the Government.

I understand that the Secretary of War has properly issued an order that there shall be no concealment of prices paid for the different articles. The Secretary of War, of course, has nothing to conceal and the department has nothing to conceal; but at the same time there has been a great difficulty on the part of contractors, and I myself had great difficulty, in finding out prices paid for some particular articles at an earlier date. I assume from the action of the Secretary of War that that was something he did not and would not approve. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to secure a little more information along this same line from the chairman of the committee, who has been so kind in his explanation to me. This matter came to my attention through the fact that on a number of occasions a very large contractor in my neighborhood had not been able to secure any opportunity to so much as figure on a proposition. There is no question about the ability of this concern in the way of big contracts. Some of the largest mills in western Massachusetts and large hospitals have been built by this concern, but on inquiry here in Washington they could not get any information. They could not find to whom to apply either for specifications or for necessary data on which to so much as suggest themselves as possible contractors. They have had correspondence and interviews with the committee of Council of National Defense, or a subcommittee, and were told that there was no question as to their reputation or ability, and when the opportunity was offered they would be given a chance to bid, but that opportunity never came. Now, the reason why I would like to know, and they would, because it is not so much that these other men get the work, but here is a large concern, capable of doing this work, as hundreds of others are throughout the country, and they are losing their organization, they are losing skilled workmen, who are going somewhere else for employment, and when the war is over they will be absolutely disorganized in taking up the line of work they had previously performed.

The gentleman referred to the fact that this matter is in the hands of Gen. Littell, and he states that in all probability this same method will be continued in future contracts. If that is true, that the authorities only desire to have the very largest contractors to be considered in letting contracts, why do they not tell the contractors outright that they have no chance whatever for getting any Government work? That would be treating them fairly instead of, in the slang expression, "passing the buck," and let them think they are going to have a chance. According to the information from the chairman, this same method will continue. In fairness to similar concerns to the one to which I refer capable of carrying out a big contract, why should not they be told that they may cease their efforts to get some of this Government work?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does my colleague understand or contend that Gen. Littell has anything to say as to whom contracts shall be awarded?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am so informed by the chairman of the committee. The men that have been here have gone to subcommittees and to the Committee on National Defense, assuming that they had the authority. That is one line that I am trying to get information on, but the chairman of the committee informs us that Gen. Littell has all the responsibility. Just where the Committee on National Defense comes in, what methods Gen. Littell pursues, just why none of these large corporations can get a look-in seems to me to be a subject worthy of consideration. But it seems to me that we should get information before the smaller contractors that there is no use in their applying for work if the scheme the chairman of the committee states is to be adopted by the department.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman from Massachusetts must have misunderstood the chairman, although I did not hear his statement, that Gen. Littell has the entire responsibility for all of these contracts. As I understand it, Gen. Littell is the man who executes the contracts, does the paper work, but the decision as to whom the contract shall be let to is made by this subcommittee of the Council of National Defense. Gen. Littell has no more to say about it than has the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman's idea is that Gen. Littell is the rubber stamp to the Council of National Defense.

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is not the information imparted by the gentleman from Kentucky, chairman of the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I understand that Maj. Starrett is the man who reads the bids and passes upon them; that Maj. Starrett has a brother in the firm of George A. Fuller Co., and that perhaps is the reason why the friends of the gentleman from Massachusetts could get no contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask a question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire whether this Maj. Starrett, of whom the gentleman speaks, is a member of that large construction company known as the Starrett-Thompson Construction Co.?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have heard that that is true. I am simply giving what has passed as rumor around through the Chamber.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any authoritative information as to the total amount that has been parceled out to these large construction companies? I know that Stone & Webster have had large contracts for constructing buildings at the Rock Island Arsenal, and in various parts of the country. Has the gentleman or the chairman of the committee any information as to the total amount of contracts that have been parceled out to these very large construction companies?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to answer in my own time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking information.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no definite information on the subject.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed, I would like to say that my general criticism is not directed to the single idea that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] expresses. I am looking at it from a broader point of view than one particular firm. The person or persons who have authority over letting contracts ought to announce—if that is their policy—that only the few largest concerns will be given consideration in assigning Government work.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that what I said a few moments ago quite bears the construction placed upon it by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE]. I stated then, as I state now, the man primarily responsible and who signs the contract is Gen. Littell; and I take it that a man who signs a contract is responsible, and he can not get rid of that responsibility by saying that somebody else told him to do it. I never heard of any such rule in court or out of court, in Government or out of Government. The man who is responsible now is Gen. Littell. The man who advised him in the past and who presumably is advising him now is Maj. Starrett. The old committee, which was under the Council of National Defense as it was first organized, was entitled "Subcommittee on Emergency Construction and Contracts," and was composed of W. A. Starrett, chairman; C. M. Lundoff; M. C. Tuttle; Maj. William Kelley, of the office of the Chief of Ordnance; F. L. Olmstead; and J. B. Talmadge, secretary. I stated yesterday that a great many of these subcommittees had been abolished under the reorganization. The present member of the committee of the Council of National Defense dealing with emergency construction and contracts is Maj. W. A. Starrett. Who is under him I do not know. I am glad the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has stated what he has touching Maj. Starrett. I have been told, not in an official way and I do not know how accurately, that he was a member of the Starrett Construction Co., but has not been for some four years, and while it is true that his brother has membership in the Fuller Construction Co., I have never been able to find anybody who was prepared to present anything definite touching the wrongful use of any power that Maj. Starrett may have. Either there is something wrong or there is not. If there is something wrong I hope that anybody in this House or elsewhere who has facts and not rumor will take the responsibility of presenting the matter to the Congress and to the Government, because I am sure that nobody in the Government, legislative or administrative, desires anything to continue that is wrongful. This is what frequently happens. Men in various sections of the country come on here desiring to do work that they are not competent for, but no man has yet been created so modest that he recognizes his inability to do a thing, and he insists that he and his concern can do it, whether they can or not. If he does not get the consideration that he thinks he ought to have he goes away declaring that there is an inner group that controls things.

There may be. I have no information touching it. For myself, when the war broke out I adopted this rule, that I would not recommend any human being for any contractual relationship with the Government of any kind or character, and that rule I have kept. This committee did not have opportunity or time, nor was it its function, to go into this sort of inquiry. We have published here in the hearings heretofore the character of the contracts. We have published the cost and the amount that has been paid these people, and I understand that this whole matter is now the subject of inquiry by other committees that have more direct jurisdiction of it. I hope the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], in view of the necessary inference to be drawn from the statement that he has made, will follow it up so that he will be in a position to either tell the House that he thinks there is no basis whatever for believing that Maj. Starrett is giving contracts because of those who are of kin to him or of former or present business association, or that he will show wherein it is being done, in order that we may correct the abuse.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have had very little to do or experience with those who have the responsibility of making contracts. I have, however, had a little experience in that regard in one case. Some gentlemen came here from my State believing they were equipped and qualified through their eastern connections to take Government contracts of considerable size, and they asked me to present them to the men who had charge of these matters. I was in position to testify that these gentlemen were high-minded and conscientious men, and I presented them to Maj. Starrett. They were treated with consideration. I was impressed with the fact that the officer in question seemed to have had a good deal of experience and probably understood his business.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask whether Maj. Starrett is a Regular Army officer?

Mr. MONDELL. I know nothing of Maj. Starrett except the fact that he is connected with the Council of National Defense and that he is chairman of the board that makes recommendations in the matter of contracts. I do not know anything about his antecedents, but he impressed me as a courteous, capable gentleman.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Is it the major or his brother who is at the head of this commission that is giving out contracts? I understand there are two Starretts.

Mr. MONDELL. The Maj. Starrett I refer to is, as I understand it, the chairman of a board under the Council for National Defense, whose duty it is to recommend to the War Department the granting of contracts.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman a question in that connection?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TREADWAY. Are those contracts in the ordinary business form that building concerns would receive if they were bidding for contracts, and have they a regular form of specifications?

That is what I am trying to get at and that is the line of inquiry I was asking the chairman of the committee when his thought went to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] in his reply rather than to me. I would like to get some idea, some knowledge of the form of contract, the method of letting a contract, the kind of competitive bids that may be asked, and the various business methods pursued by the department. If it is by Maj. Starrett, I would like that information.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that many contracts—I do not know what proportion of them—are not let under competitive bidding, but are given out on the cost-plus basis to firms or corporations agreed upon, recommended and approved by the gentlemen in the War Department to whom they make their recommendations.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I think it was testified before the committee that the identical character of contract that was printed in the hearings last fall touching this work is being used now. The gentleman will find on page 578 of the hearings in connection with the urgent deficiency bill of last fall the contract in which all the details of it are set out, fixing the rental, fees, and the contractor's fees, and all the details of the contract.

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall be glad to look at that a little.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the cost-plus method, as I understand it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. And I understand most of these contracts are of that character——

Mr. TREADWAY. May I repeat my question——

Mr. MONDELL. And they are not by competitive bidding.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I repeat my question to the gentleman from Wyoming, if he has any information as to the principle on which these favored contractors are selected? That is at the bottom of the thing.

Mr. MONDELL. I have very little information, but I am very glad to give the House the benefit of what little information I have, and that arose out of this one particular case. I was impressed with the bearing of Maj. Starrett and his apparent knowledge of the matters that he had in charge. I, however, received this impression. The department naturally desires to secure contractors for this Government work who have large going administrative and technical organizations, and that kind of a concern generally is a busy concern, doing a good deal of work, and under the theory that I think somewhat prevails in making the recommendations, it occurred to me that a large concern which would be able to present evidence of its ability to do extensive work and do it speedily, a concern that had a large organization, might have an advantage over a concern with a small organization which had not been doing a large amount of work. It might be the fact, however, that the smaller concern, with its smaller organization ready and willing and prepared to put all of its energy and all of its experience in a particular work, might, as a matter of fact, be better prepared to carry out a given contract than a big concern which might make a better showing. While I did not go into the matter carefully enough to express a definite opinion, my notion is that in a matter of this sort there might be a temptation to lean upon the big concerns with their very considerable organization, large capital, and proven ability to do work, to the exclusion of a smaller outfit or organization, even though the smaller organization might be quite as well prepared and in a more favorable situation to perform a particular work than the larger corporation or organization in view of their other responsibilities.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman if he does not think as a good business proposition, looking into the future, that these smaller concerns, absolutely reputable and capable of doing the smaller jobs, should be given consideration in view of the conditions that are likely to appear after the war is over if these smaller concerns become entirely disorganized?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is undoubtedly true; there will be no disagreement on that point.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. Now, on that point, any organization that proves to the officials in charge that has business standing and ability and engineering force and an organization that will enable it to carry on that kind of work, ought to be considered. I have not enough information on the subject to say that they are not considered. I did get the impression that there might be a disposition to lean upon the larger corporations, and larger organizations by reason of the general showing they could make of financial responsibility, of large undertakings and accomplishments—large going organizations. A portion of all this equipment so useful and essential in a big piece of work might, however, be required or utilized on other Government work which they had secured or on private work. However, I assume all these things are taken into consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If I might have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. MCKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the one consideration that the Counsel of National Defense or Gen. Littell had to be controlled by, and the only one that they should give consideration to at all, was to get this work done and done as speedily as possible, and the question of justice or injustice to a small contractor or favors to a large contractor were not elements that enter into the matter at all? And that in doing the thing that they should have done, is it not a fact that this complaint might just as well arise and yet these men do their duty?

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the first and essential thing is to have the work done as speedily and as economically as possible.

Mr. KINKAID. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say in justice to the administration——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman be very brief?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes. To my personal knowledge, Maj. Starrett, from the very start of the application in a certain instance, where a contract of the kind was in contemplation, gave very friendly consideration to a comparatively small firm, a relatively small organization, and the contract is going to be let, and is being let to that very firm by Gen. Littell on the recommendation of the chairman, Maj. Starrett.

Mr. MONDELL. I am very glad to have that testimony. I have no thought of criticising in the matter of the selection of the people to whom the contracts are let. It is very evident, however, that one of the greatest corporations, one, I take it, that was a great and going concern with an enormous amount of capital behind it and which no doubt made a splendid showing, is the corporation that seems to have most completely fallen down and furnished the country with the most astounding scandal that has grown out of the war.

Now, so much for that. About these cost-plus contracts, it may be possible that it was necessary to enter into that kind of a contract in some cases, but we have had an unhappy experience under them. I fear we will continue to have. It seems to me they ought to be limited to the cases of the direst necessity. There are some men and a great many women, probably a majority of them, who are virtuous by reason of their love of virtue and a high sense of obligation to themselves and their God and their fellow men. But with the many men, my opinion is that to whatever extent they may be honest from the dictates of conscience, their inclination to honesty arises more out of the very patent fact that in the main honesty is the best policy; that virtue brings its own reward, and the way of the evildoer is, in the long run, a sad way. The affairs of mankind are conducted largely in view of those facts and considerations. When you change the system of doing things in the world, based on our knowledge of human nature, and adopt a system that holds out encouragement and incentive to waste, extravagance, the padding of pay rolls, the increasing of cost, and practices of every sort and kind that an evil mind can invent and an easy conscience carry out; when you base your business on that sort of rule and policy there can be but one outcome. The cost-plus contract does not reward virtue, honesty, economy, and fair dealing, and practices based on considerations of justice and fair dealing to the Government and the people. It rewards extravagance; it rewards increases of cost; it rewards waste; it rewards all of those things that ought to be avoided in all business transactions. No policy that does this can be commended or produce good results.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to unduly restrict debate, but I think in view of the fact that there is nothing pending there has been quite a little talk, and I would like to go on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I have five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole offered that motion. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I think it unfortunate that contracts of this character should be recommended by anyone who is related in any way with persons connected with the construction companies to whom the contracts are let. It was for that reason that I raised the question here a moment ago as to the relationship of Maj. Starrett to these construction companies.

I have never met Maj. Starrett. I do not know whether he is a Regular Army officer, or whether he belongs to the Provisional Army, or what his relations are to the title that he bears, but I think it unfortunate for the War Department that he should be selected to pass upon contracts let to the Starrett Construction Co. or the George M. Fuller Construction Co. The Fuller Construction Co. has many contracts for the construction of these cantonments. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] asked the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] if it was not the purpose in the letting of these contracts to have the construction pushed to an early completion. That should be the intention, but the contractor does not push the construction to an early completion, but purposely delays for the purpose of increasing the cost of the construction.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit right there, the form of contract is such as to make a maximum, and it is to his interest to get the work done as quickly as possible.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not out of these five minutes.

But the fact is that the bosses tell the men not to hurry while the contractor is within the maximum cost. They tell the men, "Do not take that 8-foot board there; saw 8 feet off of this 16-foot board. Men stand around waiting to go to work from 8 o'clock in the morning until 2 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon, without doing anything, and complaining that they have not been put to work. They are told they have no complaint; that they are getting their pay.

I talked with a captain in an Army cantonment, who showed me the steam radiator in his room. It is a small radiator. It had been set up in his room by two plumbers and two helpers, and they were three days making the connection. He was waiting in the hallways and other places while these men were putting in all this time in setting up this radiator, a work that any plumber or any plumber's helper could have done in 20 minutes, and it was only completed when the colonel ordered that that radiator be placed and placed immediately.

There are men down here within the reach of the voice of some of the men who speak in this House, on this side of the Potomac River, wasting time during the freezing weather instead of rushing the construction of the buildings on which they are at work. I have talked with men to and from their work, who were not doing a half day's work, but with a full day's pay, doing it with the full knowledge of the overseer or the men representing the contractor.

These are things that ought not to be overlooked. These are matters that are of common knowledge throughout the country. Farmers, carpenters, plumbers, business men of every character, who have visited these cantonments and have seen the manner in which they are constructed, know that there has been a waste of the employees' time and a waste of the public money, and they attribute the waste of time and the waste of money very largely to the cost-plus contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

Mileage: For mileage to commissioned officers, members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, contract surgeons, expert accountant, Inspector General's Department, Army field clerks, and field clerks of the Quartermaster Corps, when authorized by law, $3,000,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the employment of clerks in the departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations for the Quartermaster Corps shall be expended on printing unless the same shall be done at the Government Printing Office, or by contract after due notice and competition, except in such cases as the emergency will not admit of the giving notice of competition, and in cases where it is impracticable to have the necessary printing done by contract the same may be done, with the approval of the Secretary of War, by the purchase of material and hire of the necessary labor for the purpose.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is in the middle of the paragraph on page 33.

Mr. NORTON. I desire to discuss the paragraph that has just been skipped over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will finish the reading of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Henry C. Chappell: The accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to pay to Henry C. Chappell, of New London, Conn., from proper appropriations of the Quartermaster Corps the sum of $58.50 paid by him for advertisements published in newspapers soliciting enlistments in the Quartermaster Reserve Corps of the Army for service in a motor-truck company of the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the item for the purchase of horses and mules for the Quartermaster's Department. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how much is intended to be used for that purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. None of it; none of the amount carried in this bill is in connection with the purchase of horses or mules.

Mr. NORTON. The provision is such that all or any part of the $26,000,000 appropriated under the item may be used for that purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, what happens is simply that we carry the regular language that is carried in the Army appropriation bill, and technically the money is available for any of the purposes enumerated, but the testimony discloses that it is not asked for that purpose at all.

Mr. NORTON. None of it is estimated for that purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. NORTON. I desire to say to the committee and to the members of the Committee on Appropriations that there has come to my particular notice the manner in which horses have been purchased for the Army. Most of the horses, or a large part of the horses, purchased for the Army during the last year have been purchased in the Northwest. There the Army has been following the practice of purchasing these horses chiefly from contractors and horse dealers instead of from horse growers and farmers. In my own particular section of the country a very bad policy, to say the least, was followed last fall and last summer in the purchase of horses and mules for the Government by the Quartermaster's Department of the Army. The usual practice was to give to some middleman or horse dealer a contract to furnish the Government with 100 horses at a fixed price. The price for Cavalry horse weighing 900 to 1,050 pounds being $165 and the price for light-artillery horses weighing 1,100 to 1,350 pounds being $185 a head.

The man holding that contract then advertised that there would be a Government inspection at a certain town. The Government inspectors appeared there to examine the horses. In most cases the contractor had purchased no horses. They were on the day advertised for the inspection brought in by farmers and by horse growers and inspected on the ground by the Government inspector. For any horse that passed the Government inspection the contractor received the Government price as fixed in the contract. These contractors in turn paid the farmers from $90 to $115 for the cavalry horses they turned over to the Government and from $125 to $140 for the light artillery horses. For the cavalry horses the contractors received from the Government $165 a head and for the light artillery horses $185 to $190 a head.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there was a Government officer at that time to pass upon them, so that the contractor took no chances on the horses?

Mr. NORTON. In many cases they absolutely took no chances whatever, excepting the chance of taking and cashing the warrant that was given by the officer representing the Quartermaster's Department at the close of the sale.

Last fall I made some personal inquiry into the methods of purchasing horses for the Government. I asked the quartermaster's department at Fort Keogh, Mont., why at these inspections farmers were not advised by the officer representing the Government what price was being paid by the Government for the horses accepted by the Government. On different occasions the Army officers conducting these inspections had refused to tell farmers who had asked them the price the Government was paying for their horses. I was told by the captain in charge at Fort Keogh that his officers making this inspection were not permitted by the War Department to give out this information. Some weeks ago I made inquiry at the Quartermaster General's office here in Washington why farmers and horse growers were not told at these inspections the price the Government was paying for the horses accepted, and I was informed that it would be contrary to the rules of the Quartermaster's Department to announce, at an inspection of this kind or in a purchase of this kind, what the Government was paying for the horses. As a result, the contractor in many, many cases, without investing a dollar, made a profit of from $35 to $70 on each horse delivered to the Government.

I believe, gentlemen, that those engaged in the horse-raising industry of the country should be given a fair consideration and a square deal by the Government. I believe that if the Government is going to pay those high prices—and they are relatively high prices for horses—the men to receive the benefit of these prices should be the farmers and horse growers who sell them for use by the Government instead of the middlemen, who perform a very small service between the farmers and horse growers and the Government. The practice that is now in vogue in the Quartermaster Department for buying horses is that the Government will make purchases direct from farmers where the farmers agree to deliver to the Government or some shipping point on a railroad at least one carload of horses. In such case the Government will not pay within $20 a head of what it will pay to a regular contractor for the same kind of horses; that is, in any case the Government protects the contractor to the extent of $20 a head for each horse. Even under this arrangement few horses are bought direct from farmers. In practice the plan is being worked out about like this: A number of farmers get together in a community and agree to deliver to the Government one or more carloads of horses at a price of $20 a head less than is being paid by the Government to private contractors. At the same time they request the Quartermaster Department having charge of their section of the country to send an inspector to examine and pass on the acceptance of the horses they have to offer for sale to the Government. A date for the inspection is set by the Quartermaster Department. On this date the farmers bring in their horses for inspection. Often they have brought in two and three hundred horses without having any of them accepted by the officer representing the Quartermaster Department. In many cases Army officers have refused to accept these horses direct from farmers and horse growers, but in such cases there usually have been present at these inspections private buyers who bought many of the horses shown at sacrifice prices and had no difficulty in later disposing of them to the Government on contracts. I believe that the very bad practice and policy pursued by the Quartermaster Department in purchasing horses for the Government should be thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Appropriations when the appropriation for the purchase of horses comes up again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including transportation of the troops when moving either by land or water, and of their baggage, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, including the cost of packing and crating; for transportation of recruits and recruiting parties; of applicants for enlistment between recruiting stations and recruiting depots; for travel allowance to officers and enlisted men on discharge; for payment of travel allowance as provided in section 126 of the act approved June 3, 1916, to enlisted men of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States, and to members of the National Guard who have been mustered into the service of the United States and discharged on account of physical disability; for payment of travel pay to officers of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States, as prescribed in the act approved March 2, 1901; for travel allowance to persons on their discharge from the United States disciplinary barracks or from any place in which they have been held under a sentence of dishonorable discharge and confinement for more than six months, or from the Government Hospital for the Insane after transfer thereto from such barracks or place, to their homes (or elsewhere as they may elect), provided the cost in each case shall not be greater than to the place of last enlistment; of the necessary agents and other employees, including per diem allowances in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 for those authorized to receive the per diem allowance; of clothing and equipage and other quartermaster stores from Army depots or places of purchase or delivery to the several posts and Army depots and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipment; of ordnance and ordnance stores, and small arms from the foundries and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; for payment of wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; for transportation of funds of the Army; for the hire of employees; for the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid: Provided, That such compensation shall be computed upon the basis of the tariff or lower special rates for like transportation performed for the public at large and shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That in expending the money appropriated by this act a railroad company which has not received aid in bonds of the United States, and which obtained a grant of public land to aid in the construction of its railroad on condition that such railroad should be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and other Government services, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charge for such Government transportation, having claims against the United States for transportation of troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property over such aided railroads, shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated by the foregoing provision only on the basis of such rate for the transportation of such troops and munitions of war and military supplies and property as the Secretary of War shall deem just and reasonable under the foregoing provision, such rate not to exceed 50 per cent of the compensation for such Government transportation as shall at that time be charged to and paid by private parties to any such company for like and similar transportation; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: And provided further, That nothing in the preceding provisos shall be construed to prevent the accounting officers of the Government from making full payment to land-grant railroads for transportation of property or persons where the courts of the United States have held that such property or persons do not come within the scope of the deductions provided for in the land-grant acts; for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies, and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several depots; for the hire of teamsters and other employees; for the purchase and repair of ships, boats, and other vessels required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, $125,000,000: Provided further, That $75,000 of the appropriation hereby made shall be available for additional pay of employees on harbor boats, quartermaster service, in lieu of subsistence.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether any change in the authorization law as to the compensation of railroads or other transportation lines is embodied in the paragraph under consideration?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. It is the same as the current law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire further if the gentleman can give the information as to the total amount that has been paid to railroads of this country for the transportation of troops up to the present time, since the war began?

Mr. SHERLEY. No, sir; we have not that. The gentleman will appreciate that in considering these items we did not undertake to cover the whole field that the item would by its language seem to cover; but we would ask what the moneys were for, and then confine ourselves to an inquiry in that particular. The committee did not raise the question of pay to railroads, and the need of such an inquiry did not suggest itself to the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was this proposal submitted to the committee during its deliberation, that officers and enlisted men who are obliged to pay for travel in making trips to their homes, or the like, should be exempted from the 8 per cent tax levied by the war-revenue act?

Mr. SHERLEY. No such suggestion came to the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been called to my attention, and I think the Congress would have exempted the soldiers if the matter had been called to its attention when we were considering the war-revenue act, that that tax of 8 per cent on railroad tickets should not be levied and collected from officers and enlisted men when they travel and pay for that travel out of their own funds. It is just merely an additional burden placed upon them. But as the committee has not given it consideration, I do not feel inclined at the present moment to offer an amendment that might be subject to a point of order and might provoke discussion. I rose largely to inquire how much had been paid to the railroads. Of course, we are paying them fabulous amounts, and necessarily paying large amounts.

Mr. SHERLEY. No such question was considered by the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I may say for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that as far as this tax is concerned each officer who travels has a right to sign an exemption certificate on every fare that he pays, and does not have to pay the tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not apply to the enlisted men who return from cantonments and camps to their homes on furlough.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it does. I am not sure.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been given different information. I do not think any one of us would wish to tax the transportation that the soldiers pay when they are making these week-end trips from their cantonments and camps to their respective homes. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserve the point of order only for the purpose of asking one question of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course this paragraph is not subject to a point of order, but I am glad to give the gentleman any information I can.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then I move to strike out the last word. I should like to inquire of the chairman what property it is which is included within the provisions of lines 17, 18, and 19—

Where the courts of the United States have held that such property or persons do not come within the scope of the deductions provided for in the land-grant act.

Can the chairman of the committee indicate in a general way just what that is?

Mr. SHERLEY. Frankly, I will say to the gentleman that this language has been carried in the military appropriation bill for a great many years. I have not had occasion to inquire into the reason of it, and I am unable to advise the gentleman touching it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks, quarters, stables, storehouses, magazines, administration and office buildings, sheds, shops, and other buildings necessary for the shelter of troops, public animals, and stores, and for administration purposes, except those pertaining to the Coast Artillery; for constructing and repairing public buildings at military posts; for hire of employees; for rental of the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, on duty with the troops at posts and stations where no public quarters are available; of barracks or authorized allowance of quarters for noncommissioned officers and enlisted men on duty where public quarters are not available, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve, retired enlisted men, and members of the Enlisted Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty; of grounds for cantonments, camp sites, and other military purposes, and of buildings or portions of buildings for occupation by troops, for use as stables, storehouses, and offices, and for other military purposes; for the hire of recruiting stations and lodgings for recruits; for such furniture for the public rooms of officers' messes and for officers' quarters at military posts as may be approved by the Secretary of War; for wall lockers in permanent barracks and refrigerators in barracks and quarters; for screen doors, window screens, storm doors and sash, and window shades for barracks, offices, and quarters, and for flooring and framing for tents, and for the National Guard when called or drafted into the service of the United States, $52,151,604.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANDERSON offers the following amendment: Page 39, line 12, after the words "United States," strike out the rest of the paragraph and insert: "and for the inclosure and completion of the recreation stadium at Camp Cody, N. Mex., and athletic equipment therefor, $52,166,604."

Mr. SHERLEY. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is at all certain that the amendment is subject to a point of order. However, I appreciate that under the circumstances under which this bill is being considered I must in any event appeal to the chairman of the committee for amiable consideration of the amendment.

The amendment which I have offered is intended to provide a fund of $15,000 for the completion of the recreation stadium at Camp Cody, N. Mex., and the inclosure thereof, together with athletic equipment therefor.

Every one who knows anything at all about the cantonment at Camp Cody knows that the conditions under which the soldiers are obliged to live are very different from those under which they live in any other cantonment. The camp is located in practically a desert of fine volcanic ash-like sand. It is subject to terrific winds. These winds occur very frequently, and when they do occur they raise clouds of this fine volcanic dust which make it practically impossible for men to be out of doors. A recreation stadium has been erected at Camp Cody——

Mr. JUUL. How did the Government come to locate this cantonment at that point?

Mr. ANDERSON. That question has been up a great many times in the House. I am unable to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. JUUL. I take it the conditions are as the gentleman has stated, but how did they come to put the cantonment there?

Mr. ANDERSON. I can not answer that question. The conditions are as I have stated. They have been found by Members of this House who have visited that camp. They have been found to be as I have stated by members of the public-safety commissions of the States of Minnesota, Nebraska, and Iowa. There is no question about those conditions. As I say, they have a stadium there now, but they have not the funds with which to inclose it. There is no liberty theater there. They can not use the stadium at times when these great wind storms occur. The result of it is that some thousands of dollars' worth of smileage books that have been sent to the troops at Camp Cody are absolutely worthless. They have no place where they can use them. They have no place where they can have athletic meets or any sort of recreation. At one time they had a tent there, but these terrific winds that come so frequently blew the tent to pieces. If they are to have any recreational or athletic or educational facilities at all these facilities must be of such a character that they can be inclosed to shut out these terrific wind and dust storms. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky to permit this amendment to go on this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the point at which the amendment is offered, without regard to other reasons, makes it clearly subject to a point of order. This is a barracks and quarters paragraph. We are carrying moneys for the purpose of increasing the recreational facilities at the various camps and cantonments. The gentleman's appeal should be to the War Department and not to the Appropriations Committee. We think when this bill passes, they will have sufficient money to take care of all proper needs touching the recreational facilities at camps.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman point out to me where in this bill provision is made for such a proposal as I have submitted?

Mr. SHERLEY. Under military post exchanges there is a provision, although the gentleman ought not to ask me where to amend the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not asking where to amend the bill, I think it is in order here.

Mr. SHERLEY. Jesting aside, we tried to give the War Department funds sufficient to deal properly with the recreational phases of camp life. We suspected that if we were subject to criticism it would be because we had been too liberal.

Mr. ANDERSON. How much does the bill carry for this purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think something over half a million dollars.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman will find it on page 41 of the bill, $550,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction and repair of hospitals: For construction and repair of hospitals at military posts already established and occupied, including the extra-duty pay of enlisted men employed on the same; construction and repair of general hospitals and expenses incident thereto; additions needed to meet the requirements of increased garrisons, temporary hospitals in standing camps and cantonments; and, during the fiscal year 1918, for the alteration of permanent buildings at posts for use as hospitals, construction and repair of temporary hospital buildings at permanent posts, construction and repair of temporary general hospitals, rental of grounds and rental and alteration of buildings for use for hospital purposes in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including necessary temporary quarters for hospital personnel, outbuildings, heating and laundry apparatus, plumbing, water and sewers, and roads and walks for the same, $18,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if in the hearings it was disclosed that this amount of money will put the hospital service at the Army cantonments in such shape as to justify a belief that every facility needed for the proper care of the men will be afforded.

Mr. SHERLEY. In reply to the gentleman, I will say we gave them everything they asked for, and apparently they have asked for everything they could think of. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. There was no disposition on the part of the committee to restrict them in these funds?

Mr. SHERLEY. The committee did not restrict them.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Military post exchanges: For continuing the construction, equipment, and maintenance of suitable buildings at military posts and stations for the conduct of the post exchange, school, library, reading, lunch, amusement rooms, and gymnasium, including repairs to buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902, for the rental of films, purchase of slides, supplies for and making repairs to moving-picture outfits, and for similar and other recreational purposes at training and mobilization camps now established or which may be established hereafter, to be expended in the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War, $550,000: Provided, That not more than $25,000 of this appropriation may be expended for personal services and no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 41, line 24, after the figures "$550,000," insert:
"Provided, That of this sum $15,000 may be used in the completion and inclosure of the recreation stadium at Camp Cody, N. Mex., and equipment thereof."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the matter further. I have said all that I care to say about it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment ought to be adopted. I do not think it ought to be adopted, altogether aside from the merits of the proposal. If we commence the practice on an appropriation bill of this kind of specifying and indicating to the department what sums shall be spent at certain places, we will have confusion worse confounded. The committee tried to be generous. There is to be expended for the comfort and recreation of the soldiers in camps and cantonments more money than was ever expended by any other people at any time for such purposes. I do not say that because of objection to doing everything practical for their comfort, but the amount of money being spent there, the voluntary contributions and funds given by governmental action are large as sums go even in these days. The committee tried to be reasonably generous with the recreation board. We gave them a patient hearing; we went over their figures, having in mind the money they had available and the moneys that are being contributed by various charitable associations. If this particular matter of which the gentleman speaks is as desirable as his statement would lead us to believe, there ought to be funds within the amounts that have been appropriated to take care of it; but for Congress to indicate and direct that it should be so expended would be setting a precedent that would be fraught with great evil in the future.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I was at Camp Cody last fall, and the boys at that camp are without any form of recreation. The various National Guard regiments stationed at that camp had regimental funds upon which they drew to erect this stadium, but the funds became exhausted before the building was completed. It can not be used at the present time because it is not inclosed. Anyone who has been at Camp Cody will understand that all buildings at that place must be inclosed, owing to the frequent and severe sand storms which rage in that section of the country with painful regularity.

There is great need at Camp Cody for some form of recreation. I am almost under the impression that the War Department has entirely forgotten Camp Cody. There is nothing being done at that place for the comfort of the boys, and even the hospital is neglected, according to reports from several who have visited the camp. While I realize that there is a great deal of merit in what the able gentleman from Kentucky says, yet something should be done to take care of the situation.

I visited several cantonments last fall, and every camp visited had very good facilities for entertaining the boys, except at Camp Cody. I was at Camp Cody in November, and they then had a large tent which was used for entertainments, but a severe storm tore it from gudgeon to stern and the boys are absolutely without any form of entertainment—even picture shows—at the present time. I sincerely hope Mr. ANDERSON'S amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANDERSON) there were 16 ayes and 21 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriations made herein for "Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps," "Barracks and quarters," "Waters and sewers at military posts," "Roads, walks, wharves, and drainage," "Construction and repair of hospitals," "Shooting galleries and ranges," "Barracks and quarters, seacoast defenses," and "Military post exchanges" shall continue available until December 31, 1918.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph, and offer the motion for the purpose of making a few observations on the way some of the money we are appropriating so generously and lavishly is being expended by those in authority.

Among the various items of money appropriated in the section of the bill just read is one for the Quartermaster's Department, and I think this amount, with amounts formerly appropriated for this department, is ample and sufficient to warrant a proper and humane care to the soldiers now serving in the various camps and cantonments who are so unfortunate as to be visited with either sickness or death. I am sure it has been the intention of Congress to furnish every dollar necessary or in any way required to enable the War Department to give the very best of care and attention, including proper medical treatment, to our brave boys now in training, and in case of death to give them decent burial. Congress has done its full duty in this matter.

From divers complaints which have been addressed to me and to other Members of Congress from camps where Illinois soldiers are stationed, I am fearful that the money so generously appropriated by Congress for this purpose is not being in all cases properly and efficiently expended. I make this statement with great reluctance and sincere regret, but am impelled to do so from a profound sense of duty. I speak of this matter now because of a telegram I received this morning, signed by Dr. Sam W. Latham, State senator of Illinois, and by Hon. George W. Bagwell, State mine inspector for the eleventh district of Illinois. This telegram reveals deplorable conditions at Camp Zachary Taylor, and states a most painful and distressing event that has lately transpired there affecting an Illinois soldier and his family and friends. I read the telegram:

ELDORADO, ILL., February 14, 1918.

Representative THOMAS S. WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.:

John Alvey, a private from Saline County, in service at Camp Taylor, contracted pneumonia, from which he died. The grieved parents visited Louisville, Ky., and ordered the body shipped home. When the body arrived and the lid was lifted for the friends and relatives to see the last of the remains, imagine their surprise to find the corpse to be that of a negro. The people of Saline County wish to enter a vigorous protest against such preposterous inefficient conduct of our business. We appeal to you, as chosen Representative of the people, to take immediate and strenuous action to correct this deplorable manner of handling the Nation's affairs. We are ready to furnish proof of this statement, and letter follows explaining in detail. For the sake of Illinois and her wonderful, patriotic people, get busy.

SAM W. LATHAM,
State Senator, Fifty-first District.
GEORGE BAGWELL,
State Mine Inspector, Eleventh District.

The name of the soldier is Ferdinand L. Alvey instead of John Alvey, as stated in the telegram just read.

I desire to insert an article appearing in the Daily Register, of Harrisburg, Thursday, February 14, 1918:

TERRIBLE MISTAKE AT CAMP TAYLOR—BODY OF NEGRO SENT HERE INSTEAD OF THAT OF FERDINAND ALVEY.

Harrisburg experienced a shock Thursday morning, the sadness of which is hoped will never be repeated.

As was feared by readers of the Daily Register when it announced in its issue Wednesday that Ferdinand Alvey had grown worse, the popular and respected young man died at that cantonment following an attack of pneumonia, the latter having been brought on by a series of complications.

Mrs. John Alvey, mother of deceased, was at the bedside when her boy breathed his last. She accompanied the remains to this city, arriving Thursday morning. Rude & Templeton immediately transferred the body to their undertaking rooms and many relatives and friends gathered to take an anxious look at their departed associate.

Imagine the shock, the surprise, when the casket revealed the body of a dead negro instead of that of the popular Ferdinand Alvey. Such was the case, and the weeping of the relatives was almost more than the stout-hearted men could bear.

The casket contained the death certificate, the undertaker's certificate, and the shipping certificate, showing the same to contain the body of Ferdinand Lindza Alvey, aged 24 years, giving causes of death and other necessary information. Just where the mistake was made is not known. The undertakers here soon got the wires hot with inquiries to Camp Taylor and the Louisville undertakers.

Where the body of the mourned Ferdinand Alvey is is not known, or was not as we went to press with this paper. The stricken parents, the relatives, and friends have the profound sympathy of the entire community in their sad affair.

Just before the Daily Register went to press a telegram was received from Camp Taylor stating that the mistake was made and the body of the colored soldier boy shipped out before it was detected. The body of Ferdinand Alvey will leave Camp Taylor this afternoon at 5 o'clock and will arrive here Friday morning.

Mr. Chairman, this is a most shocking thing, resulting from a negligence so barbarously cruel and inhuman as to be almost unbelievable, a negligence criminal and inexcusable, demanding stern and speedy punishment.

Saline County, where this occurrence has taken place, is a small county in southern Illinois, whose citizenship is comprised largely of farmers and laboring people. These people are intensely loyal and have demonstrated their sterling patriotism in many ways since the beginning of the war. They have patriotically met every call made upon them. In the Young Men's Christian Association drive last fall the quota for Saline County was $6,000. Patriotic meetings were held in various parts of the county, and when the campaign was over it was found that $22,000 had been raised.

In each of the liberty loan campaigns they have oversubscribed their quota, as they did in the call for funds for the Red Cross.

They have not only shown their intense loyalty and love of country in meeting these material demands, but they have ungrudgingly given their loyal sons to the national cause. After the declaration of war and before the passage of the selective-draft law hundreds of brave young men from this county voluntarily enlisted and entered the Military Establishment of the Government. You will find them in the Regular Army, in the National Guard, in the Marine Corps, in the Aviation Corps, in the Medical Reserve Corps, in the Navy, and in every branch of the service.

These people, as do the people throughout all of southern Illinois, stand unreservedly and unitedly behind the Government in this hour of stress and storm, and are willing to give their all in the cause of justice and human liberty. But, Mr. Chairman, they demand, they have the right to demand, that their sons who don the uniform and go forth to fight under the flag, to live or die as God shall will, shall receive humane treatment from their Government. They demand this both for the living and for the dead.

This brave young man, Pvt. Ferdinand Alvey, who died wearing his country's uniform, was entitled to decent burial. His good father and mother, who had given him up as a sacrifice on the altar of freedom, and who had sorrowfully journeyed from their home in Illinois to Camp Taylor to be with him in the last sad hour, and had made arrangements with those in authority to have his body shipped back to the old home that he might have Christian burial at the hands of mourning relatives and friends of his youth and young manhood, should have been spared having a thing so tragic, so cruel, so grewsome, so criminally and brutally careless visited upon them by a Government to which they had made a gift so precious.

Mr. Chairman, I can say no more. Words fail me. The telegram I have just read tells the whole story and reveals a condition of such gross inefficiency and carelessness, such culpable neglect of duty, such brutal inhumanity, as to be almost inconceivable in a Christian Government.

I am not unmindful also of the outrage and great wrong done the young colored soldier and his people and friends. I am not informed as to who he was or his station in life. He died, however, wearing his country's uniform and was entitled to decent and humane burial. No doubt his good old mother, somewhere, perhaps, in a cabin in the mountains of Kentucky, maybe in an humble home in southern Indiana or Illinois, received a shock similar to that experienced by the father and mother of Ferdinand Alvey when the body of some one other than her own son was delivered to her door.

I have had other specific cases of inefficiency and neglect brought to my attention, of course not so horrible as this. I have quietly taken them up with those in authority when I could. I have made no comment. I have put nothing in the RECORD, and have carefully refrained from criticizing the War Department, appreciating the tremendous burden this war imposes on public officials in every branch of the national service. I would add nothing to the burden now being carried by any public official. I want above all things our great country to emerge victorious out of this awful struggle. Liberty, public law, our peace and security as a great people, are at stake in the conflict. We must win, and I have no respect for any man who would add one ounce to the great burdens already borne by those who are conducting the great conflict. But we can not stand for criminal inefficiency, for brutal inhumanity, in these matters. I consider it my patriotic duty to speak out in matters of this kind.

This is a terrible thing. I denounce it and those responsible for it, whoever they may be. I denounce it in the name and in the memory of Private Ferdinand Alvey, who is gone; I denounce it on behalf of his grief-stricken father and mother; I denounce it on behalf of a million and a half of his comrades now wearing the uniform; I denounce it in the name and on behalf of the great State of Illinois that gave this gallant young man to the service of the Nation, and had a right to expect for him humane treatment in life and decent burial in death.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, there is no one who will not agree in its entirety with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS]. That sort of thing ought to be impossible at these camps and cantonments. I do not know anything about the facts which the gentleman relates, but I assume that he has brought them to the attention of the War Department and that a proper inquiry will be made. Certainly a condition that permits such mistakes to be made is a condition the sooner remedied the better. Yesterday I called attention to the desirability of numbering every soldier in the service in order that he might have a permanent identification that would be positive and quick and sure under all conditions. That suggestion I personally made myself nearly two months ago, to both the War-Risk Insurance Bureau and to The Adjutant General. I am glad to say, as I said yesterday, that I understand that an order has been issued for the numbering of every man in the service, giving each a number that he will retain under all conditions, and which ought to make more certain his identification; but even without that, it is hard to find excuse for such a mistake as the gentleman speaks of. I trust that there may be found some explanation that at least will show that the abuse will not continue any further.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to say just a word anent the suggestion of the chairman, made yesterday, that all of our soldier boys should bear a definite number. I do this in view of a matter which is very painful to me in connection with the loss of the Tuscania, whereby five soldier boys living near my home went down to a watery grave. Some of the bodies have been recovered. This morning I received a letter from the father of one of those boys, a touching communication referring to the loss of his only son, and I think it is not amiss for me to read it to this House:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., February 13, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM H. STAFFORD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I thank you very much for your prompt reply to my message in regard to my son who was on board the Tuscania. As we have still received no word about him we fear he is among the lost. He was our only son, but we gave him willingly in the service of his country, our great regret being that he was not able to render more effective service before his life was taken.

We do not like to impose upon you, but if you can do anything toward helping us to find out whether his body was found and identified, and if so, where he was buried. We presume it would be impossible to have his body returned to us during the duration of the war, but if we know where he is perhaps we could get some one to look after his grave until this horrible war is over, and then we could go to see him and it might be possible to have his body brought home.

Anything you can do for us will be greatly appreciated. Thanking you, I remain, Yours, truly, H. H. PETERSON.

I took the question of burial and disinterment up with the Cemeterial Division of the Quartermaster Corps. The representative of that division informed me that early in the war they recommended to the higher authorities that every one of our soldier boys should not only have an identification number, but two identification tags, with their name attached, to be worn by them, so that there would be no question whatever that in case of death they could be identified. This officer admitted that those boys who went down on the Tuscania did not have any identification number, the explanation being that they were not yet assigned to any definite branch of the service.

Five of these boys are from Milwaukee, from my own district, and I have been daily calling up The Adjutant General's office to try to ascertain whether any information has been received as to whether they are still among the missing. The names of two were listed in the telegraphic dispatches of the Associated Press as having been buried somewhere on the Scottish coast. The representative of the Cemeterial Division assures me that no bodies during the existing war can be brought back, that in France the bodies of those unfortunates who die in battle or by reason of disease have their graves marked in every case and a record is kept of the burial through a regular organization. He also informed me that the Quartermaster Corps undoubtedly is making a record as far as they can of those unfortunates of the Tuscania who are being buried in graves along the Scottish coast.

The case of Harry E. Peterson, which I have just cited, had a peculiar significance to me, because he was a West Division High School boy and from my district, a classmate of my nephew, who knew him well. He was a fine type of character. The sentiment that is expressed in this letter is grandiloquent of the devotion and resolve of the father and mother who have lost their all in the ill-fated sinking of the Tuscania. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

PANAMA CANAL.

CONSTRUCTION.

For continuing the construction and equipment of the Panama Canal, to be expended under the direction of the governor: For completing Dock No. 6 at Cristobal, $593,190, to continue available until expended; and the limit of cost fixed by the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 1, 1916, is increased from $1,500,000 to $2,093,190.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether it is because of the increased cost of labor and materials that the increased cost of this improvement here is suggested, or whether it is caused in large part by the increase in the character of the improvement?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is the actual increase of cost. It is a deficiency. The money that is allowed for this purpose was not sufficient to finish the entire superstructure at all, but simply to finish the foundation. The estimates were made, however, in 1916, and the increased cost in structural steel and other materials going to make the piers is responsible for this deficiency.

Mr. MADDEN. So that the language of the estimate limiting the cost was due in large measure to the fact that the material required to be used in the improvement has increased in price since the estimate was made?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. This dock is a duplicate of a number built down there within the limit of cost heretofore, but the increase in the cost of material makes this deficiency.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment simply to ask the gentleman from Kentucky as to why this No. 6 Dock at Cristobal is lagging behind the others?

Mr. SHERLEY. It was started late.

Mr. TILSON. Is it an extra dock or part of a plan that was originally laid out?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, there was a plan that contemplated at one time this dock to be built, and perhaps docks have yet to be built, but the policy was to build these docks somewhat as traffic demanded them, but they were not all undertaken at one time. This dock was undertaken very much later than the others, and that is the reason for the deficiency.

Mr. TILSON. It got caught in the high-price times?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the superintendent, assistant superintendent, and chief engineer of the State, War, and Navy Department Buildings shall serve in similar capacities in connection with these buildings.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the committee, a question. Are these buildings mentioned in line 22, page 47, the $2,000,000 concrete buildings that were appropriated for last summer?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not concrete buildings, but the $2,000,000 frame buildings which were built down in Henry Park.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Are the employees carried in this paragraph all the employees in these buildings?

Mr. SHERLEY. This is simply for the maintenance of the force.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Simply for the maintenance of the force?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How many employees, approximately, are there employed there? Does the gentleman know about how many?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think there will be over 8,000 when they are all fully completed and filled. I do not recall the exact number now.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. In line 12, page 48, are mentioned 3 forewomen, at $300 each, and 60 at $240 each. Now, what I want to ask. Is that all the compensation that these 60 women secure from the Federal Treasury for one year's work, $240?

Mr. SHERLEY. This is all the salary paid them for the part of the day's work that they give to the Government.

Mr. JUUL. Of course, I do not know, Mr. Chairman, what portion of their time they give to the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was just going to tell the gentlemen that they are charwomen and give a certain part of their time in scrubbing and cleaning the buildings. That is the rate of compensation that has been carried for a number of years past. They, of course, are benefited now and will be benefited by an increase in the salary of employees generally that has been and might be enacted by Congress and which is in contemplation.

Mr. JUUL. Will these women get a percentage of the increase in addition to the sum here mentioned?

Mr. SHERLEY. They would get whatever increase is made for employees, and, presumably, if it was a percentage increase they would get that percentage on the sums named here.

Mr. JUUL. I have not figured it out, but it is about 50 or 60 cents a day, and out of that they have to pay 10 cents car fare. And if the gentleman has not absolutely made up his mind to amend his own bill, I certainly will not attempt to do it. I think they should be paid somewhat better than that.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman may be quite right, and yet "the gentleman from Kentucky" is also quite right in not having the bill amended. And I will explain why. The whole policy of this bill is to deal with deficiencies and not carry increases of salary, which can and should be taken up in a different form. Now, just as the amendment that was offered a while ago by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] might have merit as a substantive proposition, standing alone, yet it would have been a legislative mistake, because it would have set the practice of enumerating an expenditure of funds for particular purposes, where that discretion ought to be left with the department. Now, in this case, if we were to undertake to increase these compensations which the gentleman thinks are too small, it would practically open this bill for increase of compensation everywhere along the line. The result would be that one group of men one day, dealing with the matter and another group another day dealing with it, would do all sorts of grotesque things, and instead of being order there would be confusion worse confounded.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will permit me, I ask, if he wants to be liberal, would it not be better if Congress would be a little bit grotesque and occasionally interfere with the chairman of the committee, rather than to ask women in the city of Washington, with prices as they are to-day, to work for $240 a year?

Mr. SHERLEY. Nobody is asking them to do that. The gentleman assumes this is compensation for their entire time.

Mr. JUUL. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have stated that they are only giving limited time of each day.

Mr. WHEELER. How much time do they put in each day?

Mr. SHERLEY. About two hours.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If I may be pardoned, I made some inquiry into the subject a year or two ago, and I ascertained that charwomen in the House Office Building got their pay there, and then went over to the Library and did some things there and got their pay; and some of them even went downtown and did cleaning and got their pay there.

Mr. WHEELER. I assume that many of these women are women with families, and only devote a part of their time to the work?

Mr. SHERLEY. Manifestly, I can not answer that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Illinois some information.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If I understood the chairman, this appropriation of $67,466.67 is simply for maintenance force?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. Does this building have a separate electric-light plant or are the lights furnished by the city?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is buying light from the Potomac Electric Power Co.

Mr. SEARS. I notice in this bill, Mr. Chairman, thay have one chief electrician at $1,400 a year and three assistants at $1,200 a year each. It strikes me the committee has been rather liberal in providing for this building.

Mr. SHERLEY. In point of fact, if the gentleman will permit, I think the mistake is that we have really underestimated some of the help that is going to be needed there, as I think the gentleman will agree if he will examine it and compare it with any other building in Washington. These three buildings are grouped and are larger than the War and Navy Building, the Treasury Building, or most of the buildings with which the gentleman is familiar. They asked for six electricians and assistants, and we cut them to four.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to make this observation. I am satisfied the chairman has cut it, and I am also surprised that the cut was made. This may be unusual in the city of Washington, but some of the Members of this Congress have had experience at home in running electric-light plants lighting an entire city, and no such expense as that would be considered for one moment by the citizens of any town or by any Member of Congress if they knew they were employing a chief electrician and two assistant electricians to look simply after the light in a building, when anybody who knows anything about electricity to-day knows that there is nothing to do but replace a light now and then. I am satisfied this would not be indorsed by our constituents. I have hoped that after this war a wave of economy will strike the country and that we would get back to earth once more and cease taxing our own people so much in order that people can hold good jobs in the city of Washington.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am very much gratified at the disposition of economy on the part of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] and I hope it will prove contagious generally. However, his conception of the duties of these electricians is inadequate, I think. Their duties amount to something more than replacing worn-out electric lights with perfect ones. I think it only fair to say that there is a million square feet of floor space. There are special electrical systems for checking up the guards of this building and for fire-alarm purposes, which at this time are matters of great importance. There are many other duties that fall to the lot of these people. But I do not want by what I am saying to discourage the gentleman or anybody else from an awakened spirit of economy.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, there is only $5,000 of this sum to be paid to electricians.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, nobody had any idea——

Mr. MADDEN. But I think the impression of the gentleman was that the whole $67,000 was being paid to electricians.

Mr. SEARS. I did not intend to convey that impression. There are also two painters.

Mr. MADDEN. And two painters can not do the work required there, and five painters or ten painters can not do it.

Mr. SEARS. Perhaps not. I never painted a day in my life; but two electricians can look after it.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the figures of the Committee on Appropriations will be so low that they will be found to be inadequate.

Mr. SHERLEY. I frankly stated to the House that a mistake had been made in this force and there will have to be an increase in it.

Mr. MADDEN. Surely there will.

The Clerk read as follows:

TEMPORARY OFFICE BUILDINGS.

For two three-story temporary office buildings of reinforced concrete with wings 60 feet wide, one for the Navy Department to contain approximately 940,000 square feet and one for the War Department to contain approximately 835,000 square feet, to be erected under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy in Potomac Park west of Seventeenth Street and south of B Street, beginning with the Navy Department Building at a point not less than 235 feet west of the westerly curb line of Seventeenth Street and 50 feet south from the southerly curb line of B Street and extending southerly not more than 620 feet from the said B Street curb line and westerly to a point not beyond the easterly building line of Twenty-first Street, including electrical equipment and a temporary heating plant for both buildings, to be located south of D Street and west of Twenty-fifth Street, with necessary connecting mains, $5,775,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against this paragraph.

I make it upon the ground, Mr. Chairman, that the construction of this building has not been authorized by law, and upon the further ground that the appropriation is not to continue or to complete a work already begun or in progress.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman may reserve the point of order for a minute.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am perfectly willing to do that, and I will say to the gentleman that if he will let it go over—and we can not dispose of the bill to-day, anyhow—until Monday, I will reserve it.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is not any doubt that the matter is subject to a point of order if the gentleman wants to take the responsibility of making the point of order.

There is nothing more important to this Government at this time than the construction of these buildings as quickly as possible. The committee has not sought to take jurisdiction of this matter for the sake of having jurisdiction. We have all the work we can do, and then some, and we are not hunting new work for the Committee on Appropriations. But when situations are acute, when situations that affect the prosecution of the war come forward, that committee will in the future, as in the past, endeavor to deal with them; and for us not to have brought in these matters would have subjected the committee to criticism of the most severe kind. In the event the gentleman from Florida desires to make the point of order, I shall, of course, ask the Committee on Rules to bring in a rule making in order this important paragraph:

Mr. SEARS. What is the immediate necessity for the passage of this proposition? Is it lack of office space?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; lack of office space. The lack is so acute that to-day there is serious embarrassment in the efficiency of the various corps of the War Department and other departments of the Government.

Mr. SEARS. Then there is a lack of space?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] insist on his point of order?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, so far as the urgency of this matter is concerned, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which has jurisdiction of this subject, could have heard this matter and could have brought in this matter authorizing it at any time.

I am making the point of order, Mr. Chairman, simply to preserve the jurisdiction of the committees of this House. If it is not proper that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should have jurisdiction to authorize these buildings, then the House ought, by rule, to take the jurisdiction away from it and give it to the Committee on Appropriations or some other committee.

It would have been as easy to have submitted the proposition to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds as to take it to the Committee on Appropriations. I do not see that any time has been gained by taking it to the Committee on Appropriations. We have been here since the beginning of the session of Congress, and our committee has been ready at all times to attend to business.

I want to say further, that while this building may be urgent, when I was a member of a public-buildings commission, composed of six Representatives and six Senators and three outside officials, representatives of the War Department and Navy Department came to that commission and represented that if they could get a million square feet of space it would be ample for the overflow of these two departments during the war, and we gave it to them. Now, without consulting us further, without even going before the Public Buildings Commission before it expired by limitation, or going before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, an appropriation is brought in here authorizing the construction of 2,500,000 more square feet of space for these same people, and I submit that the orderly way to dispose of these matters is to go to the proper committee having jurisdiction of them and having those committees investigate them. We have investigated all these other matters. Those matters of public buildings have all been submitted to us, and they have had plenty of time to present this proposition. It is not right, upon the plea of urgency, to take jurisdiction from committees in this way, and I therefore make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For two three-story temporary office buildings of the type erected in Henry Park, one to be located in Seaton Park (north) between Four-and-a-half and Sixth Streets and south of Missouri Avenue and to contain approximately 370,000 square feet and one to be located on the Mall between Seventh and Eighth Streets and B Street north and B Street south and to contain approximately 300,000 square feet, and for a three-story temporary office building of reinforced concrete to be located in Seaton Park (south) between Four-and-a-half and Sixth Streets and north of Maine Avenue and to contain approximately 270,000 square feet, including heating and lighting and the necessary connections, to be erected under the direction of the Secretary of War for the use of the War Department, $2,377,500.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to that on the same ground.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. Without objection, the point of order will also be sustained to lines 5, 6, 7, and 8, because they no doubt pertain to that same paragraph. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The maintenance and protection of all of the foregoing temporary buildings when completed shall be under the supervision and direction of the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the point of order will be sustained to that paragraph.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations, in considering the deficiencies which have been presented to the House, had to consider, among other things, the need of additional clerks, and they had to consider questions of rent; they had to consider the various activities of the Government. It was only by a consideration of these matters that that committee or any other committee could intelligently arrive at the needs of the Government touching additional buildings in the District of Columbia. It followed of necessity that if we were to examine intelligently into matters pertaining to additional clerks, matters pertaining to rent, matters pertaining to the activities of the Government, we had also to consider the matter of new buildings, where to be located, and the extent of them.

I repeat, the Committee on Appropriations has not sought to interfere with the jurisdiction of any other committee, but the Committee on Appropriation is impressed with the fact that more important than the prerogatives of committees is the prosecution of this war, and it indulges in the fond hope that that viewpoint will be somewhat concurred in by the House of Representatives. The putting out of this bill of these provisions, if continued, will result in many days of delay in connection with the building program that is now pressing, and which is so pressing that I have been not only in daily but frequently hourly communication with the various departments, they begging that they be allowed to proceed with some of the building program without waiting for the authorization of Congress.

The building commission of which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds speaks went out of existence in December. Manifestly the Committee on Appropriations could not lay before a commission that no longer existed matters that might have pertained to it when it did exist. And I repeat that I shall ask the House—not as a matter of sustaining the Committee on Appropriations, not as a matter of taking anything away from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but as a matter of first necessity to the Government in the prosecution of the war—to make these items in order by a rule, so that the House may have a chance to pass upon the wisdom of the proposals here submitted.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is true that the Public Building Commission has gone out of existence, but does not the gentleman think that when a matter is submitted to his committee that clearly belongs to another committee, the proper thing would be to refer the gentleman submitting it to that other committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. Frankly, and I say it to the gentleman in all kindness, I do not believe that it would be possible, and that without regard to personnel, for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, without going largely into the scope of the whole deficiency bill, to arrive at a determination touching the building needs here in Washington now, because the situation now is not a normal one. Oh, the gentleman may smile, but if the gentleman had worked as I have worked and the members of my committee have worked for more than a month past in trying to correlate the number of employees that are to be in the departments, now and subsequently, to the amount of space that is here—if he had sent out to every department of this Government a request, and had had a return as to the space that is being used, the rents that are being paid for it, and the amount of space that they expect to use, then he would have found that there is something more than simply a building program, as ordinarily understood, for the consideration of a committee dealing with the matter.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I should like to ask the gentleman how he makes a deficiency out of this matter at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not make a deficiency out of it as regards money. I make a deficiency out of it as regards the things needed, and in this war the important thing is to get a result and not consider simply the desires and the prerogatives of various and sundry individual Members and of committees.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I think the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is as thoroughly patriotic a committee as the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably. It is not a question of patriotism, and nobody is suggesting that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And I want to say further that I think, without any reference to the question of coordination, and the question of deficiencies here and there, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are as capable of dealing with a building of this character, and we would do it just as promptly. But this item has no place on a deficiency bill to start with, because it is not a deficiency and does not relate to a deficiency.

Mr. SHERLEY. That would be true of the building program that took place last year. That would be true of any building program that would now be submitted. It would not be a deficiency in the sense of money, but it would be a deficiency in the other sense, and the gentleman is putting a construction very much narrower than the facts warrant upon what constitutes deficiencies within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations. Now the concrete fact is that if this is not carried here there will be a delay of weeks in this important work.

Mr. JUUL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky another question. Is not the gentleman from Kentucky reversing himself now?

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be. I am not conscious of it.

Mr. JUUL. In his discussion with the gentlemen of the Building Committee a little while ago the gentleman from Kentucky ruled that a matter of a little new work down at Camp Cody where the sand storms occur was entirely out of order. Is not this a complete reversal of what the gentleman ruled before?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not see it.

Mr. JUUL. That was a new appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well!

Mr. JUUL. This is new work.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well!

Mr. JUUL. It should have gone to that committee. You ruled properly that you could not take up this matter, because it was new legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Chair ruled that way. The gentleman from Kentucky did not and can not pass on that question here.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Northwestern Branch, Milwaukee, Wis.: For subsistence, $31,000;
For household, $45,000;
For repairs, $2,000;
In all, $78,000.
Eastern Branch, Togus, Me.: For subsistence, $5,000;
For household, $30,000;
For farm, $1,000;
In all, $36,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether these increases are due to the increased number of inmates in these homes or to the increased cost of living?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are practically due to the increased cost of supplies in the way of fuel and food and forage.

Mr. COX. Not much of it, then, is due to the increased number of soldiers?

Mr. SHERLEY. In only one place, as I recall, was that a factor.

Mr. COX. Where was that—in Indiana?

Mr. SHERLEY. In the Pacific Branch.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation: For travel allowance of enlisted men discharged on account of expiration of enlistment; transportation of enlisted men and apprentice seamen and applicants for enlistment at home and abroad, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation to their homes, if residents of the United States, of enlisted men and apprentice seamen discharged on medical survey, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of sick or insane enlisted men and apprentice seamen to hospitals, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force to and from duty, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; apprehension and delivery of deserters and stragglers, and for railway guides and other expenses incident to transportation, $2,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Can the chairman of the committee inform me if this $2,000,000 item for travel allowance to enlisted men, and so forth, which by special provision is made to include the Naval Reserve Force, also includes the Coast Guard personnel, which has been taken over by the Navy Department under the act combining the Life-Saving Service with the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, these services have been taken over by the Navy, and the appropriations for the Coast Guard are first available. If they are not sufficient, the moneys would be paid out of the naval appropriations.

Mr. WALSH. Then the gentleman thinks this language is broad enough to permit that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. There is an express statute which says that that shall be done. These services, when they come within the naval service, are subject to the rules that appertain to the Navy.

Mr. WALSH. But I was interested to know why this paragraph made special mention of the Naval Reserve.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Naval Reserve are in a different class from the Coast Guard Service. There was formerly a special fund for the Naval Reserve, and in order to discontinue that practice they were expressly enumerated here.

Mr. WALSH. One further point. What is meant by "stragglers"? This provision says "deserters and stragglers." Are those men that have wandered off?

Mr. SHERLEY. A straggler is a man who has overstayed his leave, and yet is not strictly a deserter.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau Yards and Docks: For contingent expenses and minor extensions and minor improvements of public works at navy yards and stations, $2,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Can the chairman state the distinction between contingent expenses of the Bureau of Yards and Docks and minor extensions and minor improvements and the repairs and extensions under the previous item? Can the gentleman state whether these are permanent improvements or extensions made necessary by war emergency?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are funds that overlap; there is no line of distinction.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hampton Roads, Va., naval operating base: For additional for payment of compensation for property taken over under the authority contained in the deficiency appropriation act approved June 15, 1917, $55,072.25, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Can the chairman state whether this is the item that provides for the purchase of a part of the old Jamestown Fair exposition grounds?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; this is a part of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. What progress was made toward the Government getting title to all the tract, and whether it was necessary to resort to commandeering. There was considerable opposition to the plan suggested and there was a compromise agreed upon whereby the act went through the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. Under the act as it passed Congress the President was authorized to take possession and did take possession of this land. A commission was created to determine the amount of compensation to be paid the owners. The commission made its report. That report has been acquiesced in by a certain number of the property owners and the compensation accepted. By a certain other number it has been rejected, and under the law three-quarters of the price so fixed is to be paid them and the balance left as a matter of suit. There were 22 claimants who declined to accept the award.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the acreage or the extent of the property that they control?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not give it from memory, but the gentleman will find it in a report made, known as the report of the Board for Acquiring a Naval Site at Hampton Roads, Va. He will find what he seeks in that report and a great deal more which is set out there. The effect of the act of Congress is going to be, I fear, that instead of saving money we will spend a little more than the price agreed to by the House conferees of the Appropriation Committee in conference with the Senate conferees which the House rejected and for which it substituted a provision under which this action is now taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was stated privately that the arrangement agreed to by Congress would result in a greater amount being paid for the land than was originally provided. We had rather a tentative assurance by the Representative of that district—of course, not binding—that the owner of the principal part of that land would adhere to his original proposition and accept the price and not attempt to withdraw from the original price agreed upon.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. The gentleman is mistaken about any tentative agreement that the owners would accept the price. When the original proposition was made to accept $1,400,000, that proposition would have gone through because certain business men of Norfolk were practically standing behind it and practically guaranteeing that the Government might have the property at that price, but there was no such understanding when that proposition was declined.

Mr. STAFFORD. When Congress changed the terms so as to allow the Government to commandeer immediately, did the commercial interests or any other interests withdraw from their part of the understanding, throw up their hands, and say, "Now Congress has determined another course, we will not assist to get the property at the original figures."

Mr. HOLLAND. The people are willing that the Government should have the property at a reasonable and proper figure.

Mr. FLOOD. All that was discussed on the floor was that when the offer made by the people was not accepted, then it in all probability would be thrown into court. Certain owners of a part of this property were not disposed to accept the amount offered for it as a whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. The owners of what part of the property? Were they the owners that had purchased the original site of the exposition grounds and the owners of the larger part?

Mr. FLOOD. No; the owners that we were talking about were the owners of the small lots, little dwelling houses.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, of course I would not rise to criticize the action of any small owner, but I understood that the owners of the larger tracts were desirous of getting rid of their holdings, and what I want to know is whether they adhere to a gentleman's agreement and allowed the property to be handed over to the Government.

Mr. FLOOD. There was absolutely no gentleman's agreement. They offered the property at so much, and the Government declined to take it and instituted another method of procedure.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I recall, the Government appropriated sufficient money to pay them for the property at that figure?

Mr. FLOOD. Not at that figure. It was $1,250,000, not $1,400,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman from Virginia give the House any information as to how much of that original tract is now in possession of the Government by purchase from the owners?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. SHERLEY. I can give the gentleman the information. Seventeen claimants to property in the Pine Beach tract have formally advised of their rejection of the valuation on the property claimed by them. The valuation of the property claimed by these 17 parties as found by the board amounts to $205,865. Five claimants within the exposition site tract have formally advised the board of their rejection of the value placed on their property. The total value found for the property held by these five parties amounts to $465,586. The total amount of the awards to these 22 claimants that have formally rejected the values found for their property amounts to $671,451.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give us the total amount of the awards by the board of all of the property?

Mr. SHERLEY. This may answer the gentleman's inquiry. Assuming that all of the claimants other than these 22 will finally accept the valuation found for this property, it will amount to a payment to them of $751,454, which amount, added to the $503,588.25, will make the total amount necessary to carry out the provisions of the act of $1,255,072.25.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the substituted provision of the House reducing the original authorization from $1,400,000 to $1,200,000 is a saving to the Government of in the neighborhood of $150,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. The amount that I have read will be the amount necessary to pay upon the basis of the acceptance of the three-fourths—75 per cent. They then go into court, and if they obtain a greater sum than the award, the amount may run over $1,400,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that the total awards for the 22 claimants is $671,000, or is that merely the 75 per cent of their award?

Mr. SHERLEY. The total amount awarded is $1,422,935. That is $22,935 more than the agreement contemplated paying under that first arrangement.

Mr. STAFFORD. And with the risk of an additional allowance being awarded by the court?

Mr. SHERLEY. In case they succeed in the court in getting amounts greater than the awards.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word with the intention of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I notice there is an appropriation of $2,750,000 for hospital construction. I would like to know how much of that will be expended or is intended to be expended for hospitals at the Great Lakes station?

Mr. SHERLEY. It has all been expended. Seven hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars of it went to Chicago.

Mr. SABATH. Has this all been expended?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; this is to take care of deficiencies.

Mr. SABATH. All of it?

Mr. SHERLEY. All of it.

Mr. SABATH. I do it because I am informed that between 55 and 60 per cent of the enlistments are made down there for the Navy, and I notice they have from 25,000 to 35,000 men stationed there most of the time, and they need a great deal of room.

Mr. SHERLEY. There has been considerable increase in bed capacity on the part of the Navy hospitals, and this is to pay the bills.

Mr. SABATH. That is all right.

The Clerk read as follows:

The total limit of cost of the five Coast Guard cruising cutters, fixed at $2,250,000 by the naval appropriation act approved March 4, 1917, is increased to $3,500,000: Provided, That if in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy the most rapid and economical construction of the foregoing vessels can be obtained thereby, he may contract, within the limit of cost herein named, for the construction of said vessels upon the basis of actual cost plus a reasonable profit to be determined by him.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What progress has been made, if the chairman knows, in the construction of these Coast Guard cutters?

Mr. SHERLEY. None. No work has been done and no work could be done on the kind of cutters they now want within the limit of cost now fixed. So they came and asked for an increase, to enable them to get cutters of a little bit wider beam, I think, and greater length, in order that they might be more seaworthy and carry heavier armament and be of greater value in connection with their use as patrol boats, and so forth. I will say to the gentleman that the committee went rather exhaustively into one phase of this matter. There seemed some question as to whether we should be appropriating money for additional Coast Guard cutters at a time when there was an apparent scarcity in yards and in labor in connection with the building of ships. It was insisted, however, both by the Coast Guard Service and the Navy, that we could have these ships built in yards not now being used and that would not be otherwise used in connection with any of the shipbuilding program, and they felt that it could be done without interfering with the labor supply; that these ships represented a type that was badly needed, and they urged both from the standpoint of the Coast Guard Service and the standpoint of the Navy's need in connection with the war maneuvers that the ships be authorized, and the committee finally acquiesced in their recommendations.

Mr. MADDEN. One of the reasons why I rose to inquire about this item was that, if I recall, a year ago when these boats were originally appropriated for it was indicated there was urgent need for their immediate construction, and I was rather curious to know why we waited a year before we began the construction of any of the boats then authorized.

Mr. SHERLEY. They said they could not get the work done for the money. This is the second time we have increased the limit of cost.

Mr. MADDEN. Could they not have started part without starting all?

Mr. SHERLEY. Except each one had to be built within a certain amount, and the amount was too small.

Mr. MADDEN. I see.

The Clerk read as follows:

Midshipmen's store fund (reimbursable): The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to advance to the midshipmen's store fund at the Naval Academy the sum of $50,000 under "General account of advances," said sum to be used for the purchase of stores and to be accounted for in the same manner as is provided for the midshipmen's store fund in the act approved May 13, 1908, and to be repaid into the Treasury not later than December 31, 1919.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does this item mean we are running a farm down here somewhere in Maryland for the purpose of furnishing milk for the midshipmen at Annapolis, at the Naval Academy?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the situation.

Mr. MADDEN. And the farm is being run as a distinct institution separate and apart from the Naval Academy, and all the supplies that are raised on that farm, including milk, are sent to the Naval Academy and to no other place?

Mr. SHERLEY. They have a dairy herd there that they have been maintaining for the purpose of supplying the academy with milk, and the very great increase in the number of midshipmen at the academy, and also a desire to somewhat enlarge the herd at this time, made it desirable that they obtain this sum of money which is reimbursible out of the midshipmen's store fund, which fund was not now large enough to permit this draft to be made upon it at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. So, as a matter of fact, the midshipmen's store fund will be chargeable with the amount of this appropriation in any event?

Mr. SHERLEY. It will be, and the result of this action is simply to permit the money to be advanced.

Mr. MADDEN. It is simply an advance?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian day, boarding, and industrial schools, in addition to the general and specific appropriations made for that purpose in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended upon improvements or used to increase the compensation of employees: Provided further, That except for pay for superintendents and for transportation of goods and supplies and transportation of pupils, not more than $200 shall be expended from appropriations made in this act for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any Indian school, unless the attendance in any school shall be less than 100 pupils, in which case the Secretary of the Interior may authorize a per capita expenditure not to exceed $225: Provided, That the total amount appropriated for the support of such school shall not be exceeded: Provided further, That the number of pupils in any school entitled to the per capita allowance hereby provided for shall be determined by taking the average attendance for the entire fiscal year and not any fractional part thereof.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. MADDEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph beginning on line 8, page 67. There is much of it subject to the point of order, and if this item is justified it ought to stay in and ought not to go out on a point of order. Therefore I have raised the question directly as to the merits of the proposition. The question was presented to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but no information that would justify such an appropriation was submitted by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and I would like to know whether or not the Committee on Appropriations had specific information justifying this appropriation?

Mr. SHERLEY. We would not have made it if we did not think so. It came before the committee by virtue of a direct reference, which is to be found in House Document No. 721, to prevent the Indian schools from being closed up this winter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was there a showing made of the amount necessary for the support of any school?

Mr. SHERLEY. A detail of it was not made in all instances because of a lack of time to obtain the information. It was made as to a number and as to the rest it was safeguarded by the language which was put in this bill which would prevent the money for keeping the schools open from being used for the purpose of increasing salaries or for other purposes that might be questionable. Now, the sole purpose of this fund, and the sole purpose that it can be used for, is in connection with the maintenance of schools as they are now being run. If the gentleman thinks we ought to permit Indian schools to be closed and the Indian children to be sent home at this time, why, his motion is right.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not think so. I do not think the Congress or the Committee on Indian Affairs or this committee should permit any Indian schools to close for want of sufficient funds to maintain them, but I do believe that when a department asks for money upon a statement that it is needed to continue a school for the remainder of the fiscal year that they should state exactly how much they require for that particular school before getting the appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I agree with the gentleman, but at the same time I do not want the Indian children to suffer by virtue of our failure to act. For instance, I notice that at the Haskell Institute in Kansas there is $18,000 needed in order to enable that school to continue.

Now, I submit to the gentleman that even if we did not have all the detailed information that we ought to have and that we would like to have, and had not safeguarded the funds the way we have, we are warranted in appropriating money in order that the school in Kansas shall not close and those Indian children shall not be taken out of school.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am glad the gentleman mentioned the Haskell School in Kansas. I would take the responsibility as a Member of this House, a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and as a citizen of the State of Kansas, and interested in the Indians, of stating to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that Haskell will not close if this bill does not include the item referred to.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be, but even notwithstanding——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the pupils there will not suffer and the school will not suffer.

Mr. SHERLEY. Notwithstanding the gentleman's generous willingness to assume responsibility, I still insist that Congress would not be warranted, in view of the representations made before the committee in reference to appropriating some moneys. We diligently tried to get all the information possible, and I do not mean in anything I am saying to excuse the Indian Department for not being in a position to afford more information than they have. But in the last analysis we are faced with a situation which, on the basis of the best evidence that we could obtain, is this: That without this money being voted these schools, most of them, will have to close. Now, we safeguarded the fund and prevented it from being used, under the guise of that need, for other school purposes. For Congress not to vote the money seems to me would be to do an inexcusable thing.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Could any bureau representing any department in Washington make a blanket covering of that sort for a claim unsupported by any details and get away with it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; they could.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And get away with it? If all of the committees were as generous as the gentleman from Kentucky now appears——

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, they could not get away with it. The gentleman from Kansas will distinguish between matters relating to teaching of children in schools and other matters that might simply relate to routine of departments in importance.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does not this item take care of the situation which was mentioned the other day by the gentleman from one of the Dakotas [Mr. NORTON] when he called attention to the fact that several of these schools would be obliged to discontinue?

Mr. SHERLEY. There has been tremendous pressure brought to bear upon the committee by Members of the House touching this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I want is information. I have no objection to this if it has merit.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] came to the committee and wrote us touching the matter. There were any number of gentlemen that pressed the matter and from their representations the committee was forced to believe that these schools would be closed if the moneys were not appropriated. We did our best. We held this bill for sometime trying to get all the detailed information that we thought we ought to have from the Indian Commissioner. But the failure to get it would not have justified us in simply ignoring the item as a whole. We have safeguarded it by the language that is contained in the paragraph.

Now, the proposition is plainly before the committee. If they feel because of a desire to punish somebody that may not have been as efficient in the management of these matters as they should be that they should shut off these schools, this is the way to do it. But I am more concerned in the Indian children than I am in taking a slap at the Indian Department.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not basing this inquiry upon the inefficiency of the Indian Department, although I do think the Indian Bureau ought not to have supported a claim like this without some detailed information.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not quarreling with that statement, but I am dealing with the facts.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And I do not believe that the school referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, at Haskell, would be closed if this bill were not to carry this item.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman is sure of his facts and wants to reduce this amount by $18,000, so as to exclude that sum for the Haskell School, I shall not object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the appropriation is not itemized.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is. We have got that item in the very statement that was presented to the House—House Document No. 721. And I repeat, if the gentleman desires to reduce the item by $18,000, on his assurance to the House that he has the personal knowledge it is not needed for the Haskell Institute, I will not object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have the belief that it is not needed by the Haskell Institute.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, it is up to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois. I hope as soon as this matter is finished to move that the committee rise.

Mr. MADDEN. That was what I was going to ask.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will ask for a vote on the amendment, and then we will rise.

The CHAIRMAN. To how much of the paragraph does the gentleman direct his motion to strike out?

Mr. MADDEN. His motion is to strike it all out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] moves to strike out the paragraph. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9867) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

APPOINTMENT OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints Mr. BARNHART, of Indiana, to preside to-morrow.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT FEBRUARY 11, 1918.

The SPEAKER. The message that the President read to the House last Monday by inadvertence was not referred to any committee. It is now referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT CALENDAR.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order making next Monday unanimous-consent day be dispensed with.

Mr. GILLETT. I understand this bill will not take probably the whole day, and unanimous-consent business, I think, ought to be provided for. If there is a balance of the day they should have it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am perfectly willing to put my unanimous-consent request in this form: That this bill be the order for Monday, and upon its conclusion, if it shall be then concluded, the remainder of the day be devoted to the Unanimous-Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the pending bill shall have the right of way on Monday, notwithstanding Unanimous-Consent Calendar, and so forth, or as much of Monday as is required to finish this bill, and if there is any time left over it will return to the Unanimous-Consent Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ascertain if possible whether an agreement can be reached as to the time of adjournment on Monday. We might run along on this bill to half past 4 and the remainder of the day would be a very inadequate time to devote to the Unanimous Consent Calendar, not amounting to more than an hour or to a half hour.

Mr. SHERLEY. I expected to finish this bill to-day, and under normal circumstances we would have finished it; but other matters came up. But I think we ought to be able to dispose of this bill on Monday in two or three hours.

Mr. STAFFORD. The discussion of the bill might be prolonged.

Mr. CANNON. We can adjourn at any time Monday.

Mr. SHERLEY. If we do not get unanimous consent, then we can provide another day. We have got to push along bills now if we are not to get into a jam later on. I think the committee ought to bear in mind that the very thing that all of us want to avoid—a late adjournment—is going to be absolutely certain unless we get these supply bills over to the Senate speedily.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to this bill taking precedence of the regular order of business on Monday. The only question in my mind is the feasibility of making the order that the rest of the day, which may be only an hour, shall be taken up by the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I would rather have a full day given over to that business. But I will withdraw my objection to his request, in view of the gentleman's statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his objection, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order previously made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, February 17, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 17, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. BARNHART].

Rev. George Robinson, D. D., chaplain United States Army, retired, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth. Who hast set Thy glory above the heavens.

When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers; the moon and stars which Thou hast ordained: What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him? For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands. Thou hast put all things under his feet. All sheep and oxen, and the beasts of the field; the fowls of the air and the fish of the sea.

But Thou hast not only thus been mindful of man in his creation, but Thou hast been wonderfully mindful of him in his redemption! Not with silver and gold, not with all the mines of earth or the depths of every sea, could one soul of man be redeemed. The price of man's redemption must be taken from off the throne of God itself, the gift of His only begotten and well beloved Son, to become incarnate, and by a death shameful and cruel at the hands of men He came to save, atone for our sins.

O Lord, our God, we thank Thee for the life of this man in whose memory this service is held; for his devotion to his country, in his young manhood following the flag and offering his life to help to save the life and integrity of the Nation; for his service in the enactment of laws in State and national legislatures, and the interpretation and application of the laws of the land in a judicial position. May the memory of these services for his fellow men be a solace to the dear ones who most greatly mourn his loss as husband and father, and may the loving, pitying One speak the words of comfort to their hearts which no human voice can speak.

Again, in this hour of sorrow, would we lift our hearts in behalf of the land we so ardently love. O Lord Jesus, when Thou wert approaching Thy Gethsemane and Thy Calvary, Thou didst pray, "Father, save me from this hour!" So thousands of hearts in this land have prayed that our country might be saved from this time of trial. But Thou, O Christ, in submission to the divine will, didst immediately add "But for this cause came I unto this hour." So it may be that for this cause, the cause of truth, of righteousness, and the true liberties of the nations of the earth, our Nation in the fulness of its prosperity has come to this time. And as Thou didst further pray "Father, glorify the name," so we believe that we have a right to pray Father in heaven, make this Nation glorious in the great cause to which it has set itself; that it may help to soon bring again to this troubled earth a peace which shall be founded on righteousness and truth, and justice for all that dwell on the earth.

In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the special order for this service.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE COMSTOCK, OF INDIANA.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. DIXON, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, February 17, 1918, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. DANIEL W. COMSTOCK, late a Representative from the State of Indiana.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 251.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. DANIEL W. COMSTOCK, late a Member of this House from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. ELLIOTT, the successor of the deceased.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, in these days of sorrow and tribulation, when the world is on fire and we are daily called upon to witness scenes of carnage and suffering such as the world has never before been called to look upon, it is hard for us to realize, living as we do so far from the scene of conflict, what this war means to this world. It is impossible for us to conceive of the untold suffering which war brings to the nations which are engaged in it. Men who have gone through the terrible scourge of fire and blood and endured hardships and the sufferings of the late Civil War can, perhaps, in a measure, realize what it all means.

While we are now most intensely interested in the daily reports of the present war and are engaged with our own troubles connected with the terrible conflict now raging in Europe, we should not forget that we, as a nation, owe a debt of gratitude to the veterans of the Civil War which we can never repay. But while this is true it is our duty to do what we can while the few survivors are living to lighten their burdens and make their pathways brighter, sweeter, and happier; and as they one by one pass to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler ever returns, it is our duty and our pleasure to render to their memories that measure of love and respect which their service to our country so richly entitles them to receive.

It is, therefore, a privilege and an honor to-day to pay this last small tribute of our love and esteem to the memory of a distinguished citizen of my native State, my friend and predecessor in this House.

The sixth congressional district of Indiana has produced some very distinguished and honorable statesmen in its day, among them Oliver P. Morton, the great war governor, who was one of President Lincoln's stanchest supporters, and whose bust now adorns the Hall of Fame adjacent to this Chamber. It has from time to time been represented in this honorable body by men whose fame was as wide as the Nation, and none was more beloved and respected in the community in which he lived than DANIEL WEBSTER COMSTOCK. His early life was not spent in luxurious ease; but he, like thousands of our best men, was brought up to work for his livelihood under the honest and frugal discipline which prevailed in the homes of the good old

Quaker stock from which he descended. And it was from these sturdy ancestors that he inherited that sterling honesty and respect for the rights of others which characterized his whole life and enabled him to live through a long, busy, and honorable public career, untarnished and unchanged by his contact with the world.

He received a collegiate education at Ohio Wesleyan University, graduating in 1860, at the age of 20. He studied law and was admitted to the bar of the Henry circuit court at Newcastle, Ind., in 1862. Mr. COMSTOCK entered politics at an early age and was elected district attorney for the eleventh common pleas district of Indiana in 1862. He entered upon the duties of his office, but shortly afterwards resigned his office and, like thousands of other patriots of his time, answered his country's call, enlisting as a private in the Ninth Indiana Cavalry, although he had been offered a commission as a lieutenant. From a private he was promoted from time to time, by reason of his bravery and valiant services, and served as sergeant major, first lieutenant of Company F, captain of Company C, and subsequently was detailed as acting assistant adjutant general of the First Brigade, Seventh Division of the Military Division of Mississippi. He was honorably discharged from the service in 1865. He served his country faithfully and well as a soldier.

While in the Army Mr. COMSTOCK was cited for distinguished gallantry for rescuing, under fire, a wounded superior officer. While his regiment was covering a retirement one of the officers was shot and fell from his horse. Facing the enemy's fire Mr. COMSTOCK returned to his stricken comrade's side, picked him up, and rode away with him to safety.

After the war was over Mr. COMSTOCK married Miss Josephine A. Rohrer, who with their two daughters, Elizabeth and Clara, and their son, Paul, survive him. His military spirit was inherited by his son, who is now a major in the National Army, and who bids fair to shed additional luster to his father's honored name.

Mr. COMSTOCK's career as a lawyer was that of the average successful country lawyer. He enjoyed the confidence and respect of his community at all times, and was the possessor of a clientage as good as the average lawyer of his community. He served as city attorney for the city of Richmond, was elected prosecuting attorney for Wayne County, Ind., for two terms. He was elected judge of the Wayne circuit court twice, being nominated without opposition both times for that office on the Republican ticket, which in that county was equivalent to election. He served as circuit judge for about 12 years, and resigned to take a seat on the appellate bench of Indiana, serving in that capacity for about 15 years, and retiring in 1911. His legislative career consisted of a term of four years in the Indiana State Senate, and he was elected a Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress, serving in that capacity a trifle over two months. It is said that it had been his life's ambition to serve his country as a Member of Congress, but fate willed that his career in Congress should be short. His services to his country in a legislative capacity were limited, and his best services were rendered as a citizen, soldier, and jurist.

Mr. COMSTOCK was honored in the last years of his life by his comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic by election to the position of grand commander for Indiana. In all of the many positions of trust reposed in him by a grateful people he made good and rendered to his constituents faithful service, and after a long and well-spent life he went to his eternal rest, loved, honored, and respected by all who knew him best. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. DIXON, is recognized.

Mr. DIXON. Mr Speaker, for the third time during the course of my congressional service we have held exercises such as these upon the death of Indiana Members of Congress. Three Members of our State delegation have died in service during that time. First Abraham Lincoln Brick, the young and brilliant representative from South Bend; then our talented and gifted Senator, Benjamin F. Shively; and now DANIEL WEBSTER COMSTOCK, our learned jurist and legislator. Each was taken in the midst of useful public service.

It is a custom of this House that those who have died in service as Members here should have accorded them some memorial of the personal regard and esteem felt by those who were associated with them.

To-day we turn aside from the routine of legislation and give voice to our mingled feelings of sorrow and respect for our late lamented colleague and friend.

Mr. COMSTOCK was born December 16, 1840, at Germantown, Ohio, and at the age of 20 graduated from the Ohio Wesleyan College, at Delaware, Ohio. After his graduation he located at New Castle, Ind., and entered the struggle for a practice in his chosen profession, the law. While but 22 years of age, he had so successfully proven his ability as a lawyer that he was elected district attorney. While occupying this position he resigned the office and enlisted in the Ninth Indiana Cavalry. His faithful service as a soldier and his ability, energy, and courage were promptly recognized by his superior officers, and he was from time to time promoted, and when honorably discharged from the Army, September 2, 1865, he was acting adjutant general of the First Brigade, Seventh Division, of the Military Division of Mississippi.

His military service ended, he returned to Indiana, and in 1866 removed to Richmond; and until his death, over 50 years later, May 17, 1917, continuously resided there. In 1867 he was married, and his widow and three children survive him. The same year of his removal to Richmond he was selected as city attorney. A few years later he was elected prosecuting attorney, and held the office for four years, 1872 to 1876, and his faithful discharge of its responsibilities and multifarious duties gave ample assurance and promise of the capable and conscientious manner in which he performed the duties of the higher office he was later called to fill. He was industrious and studious, and these qualities, together with strict integrity and fidelity to his client, enabled him to establish a large and profitable practice. He was respectful to the court, courteous to his opponent, and frank and open in his argument to the jury, and with these exceptional qualities combined it is not surprising that he succeeded in his profession.

In 1878 he was elected to the legislature of his State as a senator, and rendered honorable and faithful service during the four years he occupied that office. Later he was elected judge of the Wayne circuit court, and after a service of six years was reelected. In October 1896 he resigned as judge of the circuit court to accept a judgeship on the Indiana appellate court. This position he filled with honor to his State until January 1, 1911, a period of over 14 years.

As a jurist he had the respect and confidence of the bar and of the people, and his decisions were always made after careful study, mature deliberation, extensive examination of authorities, and with an honest purpose to render a just decision.

In 1913 he was selected as department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana. This position was of special interest to him, and he enjoyed its opportunities for service to his comrades. He came into personal relationship with the soldiers of our State and renewed the friendships formed in his Army life. He was always ready and anxious to render service for his comrades, and they had for him the highest respect and esteem. In 1916 he was elected as a Representative in Congress for the sixth congressional district and entered upon the discharge of its duties March 4, 1917.

Scarcely had he begun the work of his congressional service when he was called by death from his busy, active, and useful life. His services were so short that but few had the opportunity to know him intimately. Brief as that service was, he showed independence in action, individuality, and a fixed purpose to follow his matured judgment in matters of legislation. Many important matters were considered during his brief service, and while slow to determine his course, yet he never hesitated to support the policy his judgment led him to believe was best. The wishes and opinions of others were considered, but never controlling.

In every position he occupied in official life, whether in early manhood as prosecuting attorney or city attorney, whether in middle life as a senator in the State legislature or as circuit judge, whether in later years as judge of the appellate court or as a Member of Congress, he so performed the duties of his trust that his record was without a blot or blemish.

Our departed friend, a soldier in war and a leader of the Grand Army in time of peace, has passed into the invisible land. Many thousands of his soldier comrades preceded him and thousands more are following him rapidly on that solemn march. The ranks of the soldiers of the Civil War are being rapidly diminished by death. But a few more years and the last of these brave men will be laid to rest and the history of their deeds be but a sacred memory; but while they are mortal, their deeds are immortal and will be forever cherished in the recollections of a grateful people.

As a member of the congressional committee appointed to attend the funeral of our late colleague I was deeply impressed with the high esteem in which Judge COMSTOCK was held by his neighbors, as evidenced by their sorrow when they turned out to pay their last tribute to their friend.

The people of his city had honored him in life, and they did not fail in his death to breathe the tenderest sentiments of affection and sympathy over his remains.

The most accurate test of a man's character is the estimation in which he is held by those who knew him longest and best.

No higher tribute can be paid to a man than to be able to truthfully say of him at the end of a long life that he had held until the end the affection and confidence of his neighbors.

We to-day attest our esteem for our late colleague DANIEL WEBSTER COMSTOCK. We point with a just pride to a record of an honorable, honored, and patriotic man. We admire his record as a citizen, a soldier, a jurist, and public servant. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. DENTON.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, it was my fortune to have been quite well acquainted with Judge COMSTOCK. I appeared before him quite frequently when he was a judge on the bench of the appellate court of Indiana, and I also frequently met him in a social way. I found during my acquaintance with him that we were both graduates of the same college, the Ohio Wesleyan University, and this established a bond of friendship between us which continued till the time of his death. He was a lovable character and always the perfect gentleman, and one always felt better after meeting him. In his work on the bench he was honest and conscientious and sought to get at the justice of a cause instead of deciding it on legal technicalities. His long service on the bench of the Indiana appellate court, which continued past the period of life when most men have retired on account of age, shows the confidence and esteem in which he was held by his fellow citizens, as well as the vigor of his mind.

I had frequent occasion to meet him and talk with him in the early part of the extra session of this Congress, and there was a certain bond of friendship and mutual sympathy between us from the fact that we were partners in distress, both going through the experiences that fall to the lot of a new Member. He was intensely patriotic and loyal, and evinced an interest in public affairs far beyond that shown by most men of his advanced age. He was one of the most faithful attendants in the House and could always be found on the floor, listening intently whenever anything was going on affecting the interests of the country during those strenuous days following the entrance of America into the world war. Indeed, I have no doubt he shortened his life by his faithful and intense application to his duties in the strenuous days of the early part of the last session of Congress, the most strenuous, let us hope, that this Nation will ever experience.

He has fought a good fight, has served his country well and faithfully, and died in the harness. He met his end as he would have wished to—fighting for his country in the hour of her supreme crisis, forgetting partisanship for the time being, and remembering only that he was an American. All honor to his memory. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It seems especially fitting that this audience should be composed so largely of young men wearing the uniform of United States soldiery, indicative of their readiness to go forth and defend the principles of freedom and liberty that have made our country all that it is, and it is especially appropriate that here in this assembly of Members of Congress are two comrades of the deceased Member, men who have already contributed of their life and substance and made their sacrifice to the cause of liberty. Of these two I shall now recognize the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, and then Comrade OSBORNE, of California.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I presume I knew Col. COMSTOCK as well, if not better, than any Member outside of his own State delegation. I met with him on several Grand Army occasions. I was with him at a very notable dinner, perhaps as notable as was ever held in the Capital, given by Senator PAGE, of Vermont, to the 12 oldest men in Congress. At that dinner there was more ancient history, perhaps, recited, and as much patriotic history as at any gathering ever held in this Capital.

I can not arise to-day and speak to the memory of an old comrade without growing reminiscent. Of the four hundred and thirty-five Members of this House of Representatives, I believe there are only three soldiers here who now survive the Civil War—HOLLINGSWORTH, of Ohio; OSBORNE, of California; and myself. It is a sad reflection that after all of these passing years perhaps we are nearing the end of the service of the men who served in that great war, and I can not help but call up some of those memories to-day.

I can see to-day the red clay roads of northern Georgia, hot and baking under the July sun. I can see long lines of dusty blue pass by with tattered banners, and under their slouch hats I can see the hardy and stern features of stalwart men. I can see the fresh earth of the battle fields and the unburied dead. I can see Atlanta from behind her black-mouthed cannon, and on her bold green hills I can hear the roar of two hundred thousand muskets. And I can see Atlanta from a nearer view—I can see above her domes and steeples the flag of my country and of yours. And if I look back over those one hundred and ten days of skirmish and battle I can see the graves of forty thousand of our brave comrades.

We know what this war cost. It was the most peculiar war in all history. It had features that attached to no other war, either before or since. In all the armies of the Union, numbering 2,212,272 men from first to last, I never heard of a soldier who went insane. It was a cheerful war. Now, if you will examine the statistics in Berlin and Paris of the soldiers of Germany and of France—I have not the statistics of England—you will find that 5 per cent of all the soldiers that have been in for a year in those terrible trenches have gone insane.

Every man who stood behind a gun in our war knew just what he was fighting for. And another feature of the war was that it was one where the soldiers on the march and around the bivouac fires at night sung patriotic songs of their own composition. That never happened before in any war on this continent or on the Continent of Europe. In the seven years of the American Revolution they did not have a patriotic song except Yankee Doodle, and the words of it are very simple. It is the music that made Yankee Doodle popular, so well adapted to the fife and the drum. In the War of 1812 there were no patriotic songs sung that were written by a soldier; and the only one written was written by Francis Scott Key, the Star Spangled Banner, which was not sung until the close of the war and was never sung in the war by a soldier. The record of the Mexican War does not show a single patriotic song that was sung. In the War of the Rebellion we had over one hundred patriotic songs.

And one of the other peculiarities of our war was that every soldier was in sight. The trenches were only waist deep. In the war in Europe the armies are out of sight.

Col. COMSTOCK in his career illustrated the average career of the American soldier. There was more determination, more continuity, in that war than in any war of all time. Let me illustrate. On the 4th of November, 1864, our army was marching to that desperate struggle at Franklin, Tenn. It was presidential election day. Tickets then were printed. We did not have the Australian ballot. The Ohio soldiers were allowed to vote. The tickets had been sent to me for my regiments, the One hundred and eleventh Ohio and the One hundred and eighteenth Ohio. We were on a forced march that day. I rode back to the rear and secured an ambulance, and I appointed three private soldiers to go in that ambulance as judges of the election. I took an old camp kettle and put it in the ambulance to receive the ballots, and when we halted, as we used to do, about every eight miles, allowed the soldiers to vote. And we counted the votes that night by the light of a bivouac fire. Now, this was in the darkest period of the Civil War. It was only in the preceding August that Abraham Lincoln wrote a letter, and that letter is now in existence, expressing the feeling that he was not going to be reelected. He was discouraged about the universal gloom that hung over this country. I wanted to give you this to illustrate the courage, the fortitude, of the soldiers at that time. In the whole regiment, one-third of whom were Democrats, with a Democrat, Gen. McClellan, running for President, there were only seven votes against Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.]

We have never had in this country too many men of heart and brains and morals and courage in public life, and at no period in our history have men of this type been more needed than now. No time in our history has there ever been a more urgent demand for just men of courage, patriotism, and ability on the floor of Congress.

Col. COMSTOCK was a soldier and jurist of this type.

It was our own poet of patriotism, Fitz-Greene Halleck, who wrote, in Marco Bozzaris, this pathetic and heartrending couplet:

> Come to the bridal chamber, Death!
> Come to the mother's when she feels
> For the first time her first-born's breath!
> And thou art terrible!

But more terrible is the loss of a fully equipped man, mentally and morally, because his loss is not only to the family, the wife, the child, but to the State. The one loss to the other is as the rosebud compared with the full-blown rose, grown fragrant and beautiful in God's sunshine. And the example of a well-rounded man, of power and influence for the good of his fellow man, does not attach to the newborn child.

One of the greatest of Athenian philosophers said:

Most of all, fellow citizens, if your sons ask whose example they shall imitate, what will you say? For you know well it is not music, nor the gymnasium, nor the schools that mold young men. It is much more—the public proclamation, the public example. If you take one whose life has no high purpose and crown him in the theater, every boy who sees it is corrupted. Beware, therefore, Athenians, remembering posterity will rejudge your judgment and that the character of a city is determined by the character of the men it crowns.

Two thousand years have elapsed since this classic was uttered, and it is still vital and valuable. The hope and ambition of our young men of to-day is fostered and fed by the character of the men the people of this Republic send into our highest legislative body. Col. COMSTOCK'S example is a potent teacher to the young men of his district and his State. Example teaches without a tongue. It is silent, but his action for good is more forcible than words, however eloquent.

And I must not fail to commend Col. COMSTOCK'S patriotism. He won his promotions in battle, but his patriotism was in harmony with the humane theory that the future of this country depends more upon the virtue and purposes of the people than upon a bannered army with shotted guns.

In the throes of human contention and fierce ambition came that mighty conflict of 1861–1865, from which a new Nation was born, and now, after long years, when the bitterness of strife has vanished and we can calmly recount the common deeds of valor and devotion, the immortal flower song of the young English poet, James Collins, of over a century and a half ago, comes as a sweet solace to blossom in our hearts and lives:

How sleep the brave who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest?
When spring with dewy fingers cold
Returns to deck each hallowed mold,
There honor comes a pilgrim gray
To bless the turf that wraps their clay.

Never before has there been such a spectacle in all the ages, since history was born in the womb of the dead centuries, as when on Memorial Days, with the rose and the lily North and the lotus and the magnolia South the men who wore the blue and the men who wore the gray clasp hands in fraternal kinship, remembering that God is good, and consecrating themselves to fraternity and unity and a mighty future. [Applause.]

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, while I had known of the high character and exalted reputation as a jurist of Judge DANIEL WEBSTER COMSTOCK, of Indiana, for many years, it was not my good fortune to make his personal acquaintance until I met him in this Chamber in April last. I had known that Judge COMSTOCK was one of the four Union soldiers of the Civil War elected to the Sixty-fifth Congress; that he held a place of very great respect in the national membership of the Grand Army of the Republic, and I had written him from my home in California that I was looking forward with anticipations of pleasure to meeting him personally.

That pleasure was realized on this floor on the historic 2d day of April, 1917, when the Sixty-fifth Congress met in the extraordinary war session.

Judge COMSTOCK'S personality was most prepossessing. It was marked by geniality, kindness, and frankness of thought and expression. It was easy to see why he commanded such universal respect and affection.

During the few months that we were privileged to enjoy his membership of the House of Representatives, it was my custom to exchange views with him almost daily on the grave questions then before Congress. His mind was rich in the fruits of study, knowledge, and experience, and his heart glowed with the same unquenchable fires of patriotism and love of country which inspired him in his young manhood to serve his country as a gallant cavalryman in the Ninth Indiana. I am glad to acknowledge that I received from his fine intelligence and lofty national ideals many inspiring suggestions as to the best service which might be rendered to our country in the present time of stress and war.

I am glad that I knew Judge COMSTOCK. I admired and loved him while living. Our American Nation is enriched by the lives of men like him. The memory of his exalted character, his services in the tented field, and later as a learned jurist and wise legislator, is a glorious part of our heritage as American citizens. Wise, brave, and honest friend and comrade, hail and farewell! [Applause.]

Mr. ELLIOTT took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BARNHART, is now recognized.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, to have been a soldier who fought in defense of his country and fought in such a way as to merit promotion from the ranks to commanding officer, and a citizen who was elected district attorney, prosecuting attorney, circuit court judge, appellate court judge, department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, and Congressman, is a substantial and unusual reward of merit for any man. Add to these honors the esteem of a community which knew him for half a century and the love of a devoted family and you have a word picture of a typical Indiana citizen—DANIEL WEBSTER COMSTOCK.

Unfortunately for me, Mr. COMSTOCK'S service in Congress was of such short duration that I had only a passing acquaintance with him, but I saw and heard enough of him to most favorably impress me with his earnestness and his patriotism. While old in years he was new in Congress, and therefore he did not actively participate in proceedings while here, but when he did speak he commanded marked attention and profound respect, for the membership saw in him the pronounced elements of a good man and a ripe scholar.

It will matter little in the day of judgment—

Says the author of John Inglesant—by what name you have been called, whether Catholic or Protestant, Jesuit or Jansenist, Jew or Gentile. These and similar things are mere accidents of birth and circumstance. But it will matter greatly whether, having chosen your part, you follow it faithfully to the end.

Abraham Lincoln once said:

I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true; I am not bound to succeed in all that I undertake, but I am bound to live up to what light I have; it is my duty to stand with anyone who is right, stand with him as long as he is right, and part with him when he goes wrong.

My brief acquaintance with Mr. COMSTOCK leads me to believe that his standard of life was in harmony with both the foregoing tests of good citizenship, and if I am right in this estimate his career as husband, parent, citizen, soldier, jurist, and statesman is a more eloquent eulogy on a life well spent than any I could pronounce.

But in these times, when the life of our Nation is in danger and a cruel war is raging, the soldier phase of the deceased's life record furnishes special inspiration for encomium. War is a dreadful thing, and the man who quits the peaceful pursuits of life and happiness to bare his breast to the shafts of death for his country's sake, emblazons his own glory on the scroll of fame. He says good-bye to home and family and friends; he lays down his well-begun endeavor to make a financial success of life in such a way that he is sure to be loser when he returns; he braves the danger of physical hardships, disease, homesickness, and injury or death at the hands of the enemy, and does it without any hope of reward, except the consolation in the coming years that he did his duty.

And I wonder if we who remain at home fully appreciate the sacrifice a man makes who goes forth to fight for his country. I doubt it. I see too many evidences that some of us want to make money out of the country's misfortune which necessitates the dying of soldiers at the front. I see evidences that many of us refuse to make any sacrifices of money or pleasure or comfort to show our fighting legions that we are arm in arm with them in self-sacrifice, that they may be as comfortable, healthy, and safe as possible. A famous general and celebrated humanitarian has declared that we ought to quit our social pleasures until we are sure that the lives of our soldier boys are out of danger and that we ought not to dance and "high-fly" socially while the brutal dagger of an enemy is being aimed at the hearts of our boys and the blight of destruction of liberty is darkening the sunshine of life itself. Oh, if we could only realize what the old soldiers, like the one we honor here to-day, know of the horrors of war, not only on battle field but in the suffering ever after by those who are touched by its dreadful brutality, we would more fully appreciate the blessings of life in a land of the free. Most of us live in an air of self-asserted divine right, oblivious of the fact that our splendid country and its matchless institutions are such as the result of misery and death in many hard-fought battles for freedom. This is no time for pleasure seeking and money grabbing by those who do not have to fight; and if DANIEL COMSTOCK were on this floor with his comrades and colleagues to-day, he would join them in emphatically approving what I am saying.

I know what it is to say farewell to a manly boy as he leaves for the front. On a lovely morning last summer I arose in a home made such only in name by a visitation of death, and accompanied a splendid young fellow to a railway station where he was to take an early morning train for the far West to enter upon the gruesome but patriotic duty of drilling men to fight to kill in order that our country may live. I was greatly inspired by his cheerful courage in leaving his boyhood home, of so many pleasant memories, to go, God knows where, to risk his life that others may live free from oppression. And when the train came I said to him: "Good-by, fine boy, God bless you and keep you and bring you back in the full spirit of honor and manhood taught you by your mother." And when I saw him comfortably seated in the train I entered my auto and drove home. And as I went the black gloom of despair seemed to engulf me until I suddenly aroused to the realization that to our principles of liberty I owed the happiness and prosperity of me and mine, and I said, with an unction of soul never before felt:

Our Father's God to Thee,
Author of Liberty,
To Thee I sing.
Long may our land be bright
With Freedom's holy light;
Protect it by Thy might,
Great God, our King.

At Mr. COMSTOCK's funeral, at Richmond, Ind., I heard many tributes from neighbors and friends to his splendid citizenship and his earnest patriotism. I heard a former illustrious Member of this House, Hon. Henry W. Johnson, give eloquent public testimony to Mr. COMSTOCK's worth to his community and to his country, and I saw a great concourse of people bow in silent resignation to the inevitable as Mother Earth closed over all that was mortal of our beloved colleague. And as we turned and slowly started back, to serious responsibilities for the living, we all silently and reverently invoked the benediction:

Peace to his ashes and honor to his memory.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. WOOD, is recognized.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I shall never forget the first time I saw Judge COMSTOCK. It is now more than a quarter of a century ago. It was at Indianapolis, the occasion being a Republican State convention. His personality and his figure were so marked that you would pick him out, no matter how large the concourse of people. Tall, straight as an Indian, with high cheek bones, aquiline nose, and prominent features, to my mind he was a present-generation representation of the old Roman tribune; and throughout his long life, active as it always was, he maintained that same activity of body up to the very time of his death. The last time that he ever visited this Capitol he walked up here from his hotel, the Dewey, on the morning of that day, and as I saw him coming into the House Office Building he seemed to walk with all the agility of young manhood.

His type is rapidly passing; and, as has been suggested here, in his passing is to be found a most forceful reminder—with what a heavy hand mortality has laid itself upon the survivors of the Civil War! For a long time after the close of the Civil War this body was dominated by the veterans of that war, and for many years thereafter they were a power in the legislation of this country. One after another they have passed away until to-day there is a very small remnant of them left. There were five elected to the Sixty-fifth Congress. Two of them are gone. I am happy to find here to-day, paying tribute, two of those who remain. Not long will it be until the veterans of the Civil War with us will be only a memory.

Indiana contributed to that great conflict 224,000 men. Five thousand of them answered the last call last year. But 18,000 now remain. Every 15 minutes of time announces the death of a soldier of the Civil War. So, as I say, not long will it be until with us they will be only a memory.

Throughout his long career Judge COMSTOCK was most active in the affairs of life. Very nearly one-half of his lifetime was spent in public office, in the discharge of public duties; and to my mind it is one of the greatest tributes that can possibly be paid to his manhood that he should have been so highly respected not only by the people of the community in which he lived, and honored by them, respected not only by the State to which he gave so much, and signally honored by that State, but at last respected by the United States.

True, he was permitted to give only a small measure of his time and ability to the Congress of the United States. Yet what little he did give was evidence of the fact of his willingness to do and his capacity to perform. On the three or four occasions when he spoke before this body upon questions that were of most vital importance and concern to the country he was listened to with attentive ears, and the words of wisdom that came from his lips found lodgment in the hearts of the men he addressed, because of the sincerity which they well knew prompted their speaking.

Throughout all the busy life of DANIEL W. COMSTOCK there was ever with him that natural human desire for companionship, for the mingling with his fellow men, and his friendships were strong and true. When I went to Richmond to attend the funeral I saw among those who came to pay the last tribute of respect Judge Joseph M. Rabb, of Logansport. They were old friends; they had been soldiers together and jurists together, friends ever; and I thought if ever there was a true tribute of respect paid, it was paid by Judge Rabb, for he had traveled far to pay this tribute. Many a time have I been regaled in listening to those two men, bantering each other with good-natured jokes and jests, and the bright humor and sharp repartee that passed between them was ever a delight.

The tribute that was paid to Judge COMSTOCK by Henry U. Johnson, one of the most eloquent men that the State of Indiana has ever produced, and one of the most eloquent men whose voice was ever heard in this Chamber, on the occasion of the funeral exercises in Richmond, I thought was most remarkable. It was not one of those fulsome tributes that are too often paid to the memory of men who are dead, but it was a recital to those old friends and neighbors and acquaintances of Judge COMSTOCK's life as it was, as it had been spent among them, and as they all knew it; and I felt that here is a tribute to a man that should be cherished forever by those of his kindred and friends left behind, for it was a most worthy tribute to a splendid character.

As that day we wended our way through the winding streets of that beautiful cemetery where we laid him away to rest among those who had passed before him, of his friends and acquaintances, I felt that it was a most fitting receptacle for all that was mortal of our colleague and friend. There we laid him in the shade of two forest trees that will stand as vigils over his grave for many years to come, and through their boughs a requiem will be chanted to his memory by each passing breeze. There he rests, and rests well, after long years of active service. He died as all of us should wish to die—in the full possession of an active body and strong mentality. Death at such a time is a fitting crown to life. [Applause.]

Mr. BARNHART resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. MOORES, is now recognized.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, DANIEL W. COMSTOCK was a fine type of the first generation of children born in what had been the old Northwest Territory. The pioneers who came across the Alleghenies to build homes in the wilderness were the sturdy, adventurous sons of the most vigorous of the old colonial stock. They came in almost equal numbers from the northern and southern colonies and were men of courage, force, and determination, and largely of good education. In their associations in their new homes they were not in any way sectional, but from the very first intermarried with families of pioneers who had come from colonies far removed from their own places of birth. Many of the pioneers had served in the American Revolution, as had also the fathers of most of the others.

Judge COMSTOCK was born in 1840, at Germantown, midway between Dayton and Hamilton, Ohio, and was the son of a reputable physician, Dr. James Comstock, of a colonial family famed for its achievements in medicine, chemistry, and physics, born in Connecticut, himself the son of a soldier of the Revolution. The mother, Mary Wade Croke, a native of Virginia, was the daughter of Richard Croke, a native of Ireland, who came of a family of lawyers and jurists justly eminent in the English and Irish courts from the time of King Henry VIII.

DANIEL W. COMSTOCK was graduated in 1860 from Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, Ohio, where he was contemporary with the poet John James Piatt, for years librarian of the National House of Representatives. A year later he located in Indiana and was admitted to the bar. In the summer of 1862 he was elected district attorney for the common pleas, and shortly after was tendered by Gov. Morton a commission in the Volunteer forces, which he refused on the ground that he had assumed the duties of prosecutor. The reverses of the spring of 1863, however, convinced COMSTOCK that his duty to the Nation was more urgent than that he owed his State, and, willing and glad to respond to the call for more men, he resigned his office and enlisted as a private in a veteran regiment, the Ninth Indiana Cavalry. His regiment was a fighting one, and was many times in action on the battle field. By rapid successive promotions he became sergeant major, first lieutenant, and captain in the line, and after the end of the war served for several months as brigade assistant adjutant general of the Seventh Division of the Military Division of Mississippi. Finally, discharged September 18, 1865, he returned to Indiana, took up law practice in Richmond, and married the wife who now survives him. Almost at once he was chosen city attorney of Richmond, and was elected prosecuting attorney in 1872 and again in 1874. He represented Wayne County in the State senate from 1878 to 1882. In 1884 he was elected circuit judge, and served for 12 years, resigning in 1896 to accept a seat on the bench of the appellate court of the State, where he served until January, 1911, having been elected three times a judge of the appellate court of Indiana. He was department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic for his State in 1913, and in 1916 was elected Representative in Congress from his district, which his party had not previously carried for years.

It is the privilege of few men to give as many years to the service of their communities, the State, and the Nation, as was the fortune of our late associate. As soldier, lawyer, legislator, and jurist, he served conspicuously, faithfully, and creditably, for practically the entire period of his manhood, by a clean life, zealous devotion to duty, and sterling honesty, avoiding even the breath of scandal or the suspicion of wrongdoing.

From the story of his life the first and greatest lesson to be learned is that of service.

At the very outset of his career in his chosen profession, honored by being given an office which offered a most enviable opportunity for achieving distinction in his profession, he cheerfully gave it up to go to the front as a common soldier, although, at a time when men were not so sorely needed, he had refused military command. Entering as a raw recruit a veteran cavalry regiment, the jest and byword of his more experienced comrades, he had the good fortune to be sent almost at once into one of the fiercest battles of the Civil War and to carry off from the field of battle under a steady fire from the enemy the body of his commander, wounded almost to the death. Repeated acts of heroism during a campaign of rather more than a month of hard fighting won for the recruit his first promotion, and the others speedily followed in the rapidly changing panorama of the latter months of the war. Such was the esteem in which he was held by the people of his city, his county, his circuit, his district, and his State that Judge COMSTOCK met a constant demand for public service, and was given scant opportunity to take rank in his chosen profession, the law.

He was a man of fine presence, with courteous and engaging manners. His opinions as a judge were clear and concise, without any attempt at rhetorical expression; they briefly stated the facts, the issue, and the principles of law involved in the decision, with abundant and apt reference to authority. He never criticized counsel, nor did he inject into his opinions lengthy discussions of broad legal questions in only a general way applicable to the matters at issue. They were as a rule of little interest even to lawyers, but in form and expression they were ideal.

He was a ready, fluent, and forcible speaker, but never wearisome; and his oratory possessed imagination and poetic expression. During his short service in the House he spoke but three times, and then briefly—on April 14 (page 673), supporting the emergency bond issue; on April 27 (page 1405), advocating the enlistment of volunteers in preference to conscription; and on May 3 (page 1774), supporting an amendment to the espionage bill. From his speech of April 27, I quote:

> Having grown up in the belief that one who makes to his country the offering of his life should live ever after in its grateful memory * * * the impression formed in youth has been emphasized by reading. * * *
> On fateful fields of the Republic monuments are erected, on which are raised, in bronze and marble, figures of the volunteer soldier and sailor, in honor of the defenders of our common country—not to the conscript. The volunteer system has been characterized on the floor of the House as archaic, and even as vicious.
> High praise has been given to the Volunteers of 1861. They were volunteers, without distinction of age or sex. On both sides of the line men, women, and boys entered into honorable rivalry in aiding the cause in which they believed.
>
> "The wife whose babe first smiled that day,
> The fair young bride of yester eve, and matron gay,
> And aged sire, all saw loved warriors haste away,
> And deemed it sin to grieve."
>
> The result of that spirit, the hearty discharge of duty, converted an age which had become commonplace and sordid into one of heroism and self-denial.
> Archaic is of Greek origin, and means old. I admit the charge. The immortal 300 who defended the famous pass; Horatius, who held the bridge; Curtius, who threw himself into the breach to save his country; the young American who fired the shot heard "round the world"; the heroes of Concord and Lexington; the men who fought with Warren at Bunker Hill; the victors at Kings Mountain; those who gave the Hornets Nest its name; Francis Marion, the swamp fox; the illy fed, illy clothed, and poorly paid men who constituted an army—an army in name only—and followed the Father of his Country through the vicissitudes of the Revolution until privileged to see the banner of the proud mother country lowered to her victorious and rebellious sons; and the brave men who died in defense of the Alamo were volunteers. It has been truly said that all our wars, practically, have been fought and won by volunteers. All that is past—it should not be forgotten. * * *
> In the great war in which we are engaged we are going to furnish, either as volunteers or conscripts, or as both, all the men necessary to its successful prosecution. In essentials we are all standing by the President; and the only question now is, Shall the army be raised by the volunteer or conscriptive system? All are agreed as to the end, but differ as to the means. * * *
> A reference to the first American, the only Washington, always awakens interest and commands respect. This is due to the fact that we cherish his memory with religious gratitude. In whatever position or attitude history presents him, we look upon him with veneration and affection. As just as Cato, without his austerity, as brave as Caesar, without his sinister ambition, what views he expressed upon any subject are accepted as almost conclusive. The letters of the great Washington read by my distinguished friend from California on the subject must be read in connection with the times and conditions under which they were written. That time was when the country was impoverished, when Tories were busy in conspiracies and work against the colonies and the future of the struggling Republic looked dark. Bad men were sowing dissensions in the colonial ranks, attacking even the character of their unselfish leader, challenging his integrity as a man, and denying him merit as a soldier. Such conditions do not exist here. * * *
> Certainly it is proper to take into account the spirit of the men, as soldiers, who offer without compulsion to serve, and those whose service is enforced. Heretofore we have thought it worth while to permit men to volunteer and serve their country as units, continuing the associations of civil life; boys that grew up on adjoining farms, perhaps attended the same school, to continue the associations in the same regimental and company units. It has worked well in the past. The proposed conscription does not contemplate the continuance of these relations; and men and boys, however intimate and close their associations were, may be separated and sent to widely different fields.
> Service in war in defense of our representative Government is a duty, but it need not be devoid of sentiment. With the service, if we would make it most effective in connection with the discharge of duty, may also go along the amenities of war, the comradeship growing out of mutual toil and suffering; the "martial courtesy which lends to danger grace, to valor pride"; relieving and mitigating its sad offices. * * *

To-day we mourn one ripe in years, who, after a long life devoted to the service of others and crowded with honors, has been taken for higher duties. In life he had our trust, our utmost confidence in his integrity, our love—and we shall long remember him as a brave, modest, courteous, kindly, Christian gentleman.

Of him we can say as a great poet said of one of our greatest captains:

> Glory and honor and fame and everlasting laudation
> For our captains who loved not war, but fought for the life of the Nation;
> Who knew that, in all the land, one slave meant strife, not peace;
> Who fought for freedom, not glory; made war that war might cease.
> Glory and honor and fame; the beating of muffled drums;
> The wailing funeral dirge, as the flag-wrapped coffin comes;
> Fame and honor and glory; and joy for a noble soul,
> For a full and splendid life, and laureled rest at the goal.
> * * * * * *
> But better than martial woe, and the pageant of civic sorrow;
> Better than praise of to-day, or the statue we build to-morrow;
> Better than honor and glory, and history's iron pen,
> Was the thought of duty done and the love of his fellow men.

[Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the splendid tributes of respect that have been paid to the memory of Judge COMSTOCK by gentlemen who knew him but confirm the impressions that were made upon my mind in a very brief association with him in this House. Perhaps the strangeness that is common to us all when first we are permitted to enter the House, drawn from a continental area representing 100,000,000 of people, was as strange to him, though aged, as to us, for every new experience puts a new stamp upon a man, and no sooner is it given than it seems as if the whole concourse of events had been directed to that end. My first meeting with our colleague was in Indianapolis, just a few weeks before the assembling of Congress—simply a passing touch; and yet, having known something of his public career, I became immediately interested in his personality.

When he came here his striking figure challenged the attention of all. The gentleness of his manner, the kindly quality that characterized his speech, together with the care with which he uttered his judgments, signified to me that the habits of his life had been the habits of a thoughtful man. No doubt all of us in these times are moved with any allusions to the soldier life. I can understand that all the things that draw men together are experienced by the soldier. A common thought, a common interest, a common suffering, a common sacrifice, are the things that tie men close together. To my mind there has been to-day the thought of the deeper current that ran through his life history. I was but a child of five when the Civil War broke out. To me it is scarcely a memory. Indistinct, far away, as if from another age, there comes a slight memory of troops parading and of having been led by my father in safety beside the cavalry, and then I remember, too, on two or three other occasions indistinctly how my childish heart was stirred by martial music and the tramp, tramp, tramp of the boys as they marched away.

The years that have intervened, however, have made incarnate some of the phases of that mighty struggle, and the recent experiences in my home have intensified and deepened the significance of it all. When that call came from President Wilson in our recent Mexican trouble, out from my own home one young man, strong, and loving liberty, gave himself to his country only to come back to be carried out to the hill beyond the town to wait the Resurrection Morn. Ah, men, I have counted it an honor that his grave should be marked with a simple stone that is given to the private. The deeper current had run through the thought of that young man's life, and he and the older man would not have been strangers had they met here on the floor of this House. It was fortunate that DANIEL W. COMSTOCK was permitted to have a part in that great struggle in the great Civil War, to be a determining factor in seeing to it that the principles which have made this Government possible in perpetuity were made safe by the sacrifice of his time, his talent, and the endangering of his life.

The name of Oliver P. Morton has been mentioned upon the floor of this House to-day. In one of the keenest fought political battles of all the stress of that war Oliver P. Morton went before the people of our State and said:

> The Constitution and laws of the United States operate immediately and directly upon the individual and not upon the State and as if there were no States intervening.

He succeeded in that conflict and no doubt DANIEL W. COMSTOCK worked to the end that that principle might obtain in human government; and after the lapse of more than 50 years to be permitted upon this floor to vote for bills that make it possible that this war shall be efficiently conducted was but a vote in harmony with the convictions of a lifetime. Fortunate, indeed, was his entrance into the Congress of the United States. He was wise, careful, dignified, kind, gentle—one of the old school; aged, indeed, but not decrepit, but retaining the fierce fires intellectually of his youth, held by the firmness of his judgment and directed effectively in the doing of his duty.

May I not in passing say that perhaps the aged are not appreciated as they should be? I know no benediction like that of the young man coming close to the man of age, worthy, of high ideals, strong and yet tempered by his experiences—no greater benediction can come to any young man. So I have sought to know the older men of the House, perhaps reckoned among them, and yet with more than twenty years between Mr. COMSTOCK and myself. May we not prize to-day the opportunity to have listened to the recounting of the experiences of his life. We have come here from strangely differing communities. We have known each other for but a short time, and yet the membership of this House has been tied together by a common experience, by the mighty responsibilities that have been put upon the individual Members, in a way that could not have occurred probably in several sessions. I felt a little diffident even about speaking to-day, because I had not known Mr. COMSTOCK. But after having heard gentlemen talk who knew of his career I shall feel that in a sense I knew him. I felt, even in the short acquaintance, that I could learn to love and respect permanently the life that was behind him, because he bore in his attitude toward men and in the manner in which he addressed this House evidence of a cultivated mind and a gentle spirit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order authorizing these services, the House now stands adjourned.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Monday, February 18, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. ROBINSON. I submit an amendment to the pending railroad bill affecting the subject of compensation. To the amendment I call the attention of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and I desire particularly to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to it. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table. I will state that the effect of the amendment is to eliminate from the authorization for compensation the amount alleged to have been invested in railroad property in the six-month period ended December 31, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. McLEAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DISCHARGE OF CAPT. ARTHUR E. PERELESS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read a letter received yesterday from the War Department in reply to an inquiry which I made on Friday last regarding the circumstances attending the discharge of Capt. Pereless from the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1918.

DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: The Secretary of War is away from Washington on an inspection tour for several days, and I take the liberty of forwarding to you immediately a copy of a memorandum just received for him from the Acting Quartermaster General regarding Arthur E. Pereless, concerning whom you recently inquired.

Cordially, yours,

RALPH A. HAYES,
Private Secretary.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, February 16, 1918.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The discharge of Capt. Arthur E. Pereless from the Quartermaster Reserve Corps had no relation, directly or indirectly, to the testimony which Capt. Pereless gave before the Military Committee of the United States Senate. It is not, and has never been, the policy of the Acting Quartermaster General, to discipline any officer for the testimony before a committee of either branch of Congress.

On the other hand, the Acting Quartermaster General desires that committees of the Senate and the House shall have access to any information which may be desired, and no restrictions are imposed upon any officer called upon to testify.

Capt. Pereless was honorably discharged for reasons entirely and solely due to service considerations. It was necessary to reorganize, among other divisions of this office, the conservation division, with which Capt. Pereless was connected.

Examination of the qualifications of Capt. Pereless disclosed that he lacked the efficiency considered necessary for the performance of the duties with which he was charged. That Capt. Pereless realized the situation is shown by the fact that he himself notified a subordinate of the Acting Quartermaster General that he had tendered his resignation as an officer of the Army, which resignation an examination of the records disclosed had not been submitted in writing; and further in a letter dated January 22, 1918, signed by him and addressed to the Acting Quartermaster General, Capt. Pereless stated:

"As the necessary appointments have been made for the organization and carrying on of the Conservation Division, the necessity of my further services is no longer apparent, and I request that I be returned to the inactive list, Quartermaster Reserve Corps. The duties which I abandoned in New York, the return to which is still open to me, justify me in making the above request, as under the circumstances I do not feel that the financial sacrifice involved in the change is any longer required."

The Acting Quartermaster General does not regard it as good policy, in view of the need of officers, to make transfers to the inactive list. The extensive duties of the Quartermaster Department demand the use of every officer holding a commission and available for service. An officer assigned to the inactive list is dead weight, which no up-to-date business organization should carry.

Therefore the Acting Quartermaster General decided to pursue in the case of Capt. Pereless the policy observed in similar cases, viz, to direct his honorable discharge, and to appoint in his place an efficient officer capable of carrying on the important work of the Reclamation Division. This was done under date of January 30. Under date of February 14, in answer to a letter from Mr. Pereless, dated February 1, requesting that the order for his honorable discharge be changed so as to transfer him to the inactive list of the Quartermaster Reserve Corps, this office expressed the policy adopted as follows:

"Referring to your letter of February 1, in which you make request to be returned to the inactive list of the Quartermaster Reserve Corps, you are advised that your discharge was recommended because your services were no longer required. This office will follow the policy established of discharging all Reserve and National Army officers whose services are no longer required, rather than to return them to the inactive list."

GEO. W. GOETHALS,
Acting Quartermaster General.

ENLISTMENT OF AMERICAN BOYS IN BRITISH ARMY.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I depart from my usual custom by asking to have the following telegram read from the desk and the privilege of making a remark or two relative to the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., February 17, 1918.

Senator P. C. KNOX,
Washington, D. C.:

Joseph Barbour, age 16; Reed Miller, age 14; both under the name of Clayton; and Francis McKnight, age 16, under name of Semple, recruited by local British Army office, and spirited to Canada Saturday night. Will reach Windsor, Nova Scotia Tuesday. Mr. Heinie, local recruiting officer, refuses to take action. Have them stopped and returned at once, at Montreal, probably this evening. All are sons of American citizens. Copy of this message also sent to Secretary of State.

G. H. BARBOUR.
WM. MCKNIGHT.
A. W. MILLER.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I have had this telegram read not because I have any apprehension about the action that this Government will take under the circumstances. Indeed, I saw the Secretary of State this morning and his indignation was equal to my own, and he will take up this matter at once with the British Embassy, who I have no doubt will cooperate with him in securing the return of these children to their homes in the city of Pittsburgh.

My sole purpose is thus publicly to bring to the attention of foreign recruiting officers within the United States the fact that the privilege we extended to them last summer to open recruiting offices to enlist their own nationals does not extend to kidnapping American children. A child 14 years of age and three of 16, members of reputable families in our city, were enlisted, and the recruiting officer, after their age and citizenship had been brought to his attention, refusing to extend any relief——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania whether these boys voluntarily offered their services to the recruiting officer?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I have had read to the Senate all the information that I presently possess, but I propose to cover that point in a moment. The law always has been until the act of August 7, 1917, was passed, that it was a criminal offense for foreign Governments to open a recruiting office in the United States even to enlist their own nationals. The policy of Governments has always been that within their borders offices for the replenishing of the army of a foreign power should not be set up; but under the circumstances of this war we decided that it was wise to give our allies an opportunity to reach their own nationals within the United States by permitting them to open recruiting offices. But we reenacted the old law in that statute even by a proviso which said that no American citizen should be enlisted for the purpose of being sent out of the country under the provisions of this law, and there is a penalty prescribed of $1,000 and not more than three years' imprisonment for this offense.

I do not know to what extent these children were participants in this matter. All I know is, the fact that they were of these tender years was presented to this foreign recruiting officer, and he declined to facilitate their return or enter into any effort to have them returned.

If the facts are as alleged in this telegram, it is my intention to bring the matter to the attention of the Attorney General and insist upon prosecution, because it is worth while to give notice that the privileges we have extended to foreign countries shall not be abused, and abused in this flagrant manner.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3752, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it is my purpose to discuss briefly, if I may, the pending measure. I purpose to address myself principally, first, to the method of compensation which is provided for in the bill as it was reported by the committee; secondly, the substitute plan offered by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]; and, thirdly, section 13, relating to the time during which the Government shall continue to operate these roads.

I hope the Senate will pardon me if I take just a few minutes, perhaps, to repeat some things which have been said during the last week in the discussion of this bill.

I realize, as every Senator does who has given any attention to this measure, its involved character, and the impossibility of determining to a nicety a rule of just compensation. This all grows out of the fact, largely, that we can not anticipate what the future will bring forth. We do not know what the valuation of the property of the railroads is. In fact, whatever estimates are made upon that subject by any man, no matter how much careful attention he may have given to it, are the sheerest guesswork.

It has already been developed in the discussion of this bill that, while the traffic of the railroads has been increasing, the equipment of the roads has been decreasing. In classes 1 and 2 of the railroads, which include all that had an income over and above $100,000, in 1915 there were 64,205 locomotives; in 1916 there were 62,909 locomotives; and there was substantially no increase during 1917, though we have not been able to get the figures for that year. So from 1915 to 1916 there was a net loss in locomotives of 1,206.

During the year 1915 there were 2,346,932 freight cars; in 1916 there were 2,289,513 freight cars; a net loss in one year of 57,419 freight cars.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator as to the list of locomotives. The figures which he has given I believe to be perfectly accurate; but is it not true that the decrease in the number of locomotives to some extent is due to the fact of scrapping the smaller classes of locomotives, the new locomotives being of a larger capacity, although undoubtedly there has not been as great an increase in locomotives as there should have been?

Mr. POMERENE. There may be some truth in the statement. I want to impress particularly upon the Senate—and this is my purpose in giving these figures—the fact that if we are going to be just we must deal rather liberally with the railroads than stingily at this particular time.

In 1915 the total passenger cars were 54,766; in 1916 they were 53,730, a net loss in that one year of 1,036. The increase in the traffic has been tremendous. Immediately after the war 631 railroads, with a total mileage of 262,000, coordinated the operation of their roads here in Washington for the purpose of increasing their efficiency, and the railroad authorities advise us that during the six months from April to September, 1917, the traffic per month exceeded the average per month during 1916 by 20.3 per cent, and the average per month for the year 1915 by 50 per cent; or, to put it in another way, the tonnage for the whole year 1917, based upon the experience for six months, shows a total ton-mileage of 409,405,000,000, an increase of 135,164,000,000 ton-miles over the business of 1915.

This increase from 1915 to 1917 represents a total service in excess of all the railroads of Canada, Germany, Great Britain, Russia, France, and Austria, excluding Hungary, with a mileage of 178,542, and serving a population of 323,000,000.

These railroad officials present the facts showing the increase in railroading in another way and perhaps more forcefully. In the first six months after we entered the war the railroads handled as much freight as they did during the entire year 1906. In 1906 the average freight train carried 344 tons; in the six months following the declaration of war they carried 675 tons. Or, to present their case in still another way, if the traffic for these six months in 1917 had moved in the same average trainload as in 1906, 96 per cent more freight-train service would have been required.

Senators, I realize that when we begin to discuss the subject of railroads we are touching a topic that arouses resentment and sometimes unfairness in dealing with it.

One of the best informed railway men in this country testified before the Interstate Commerce Committee that the total value of the railroad property of this country amounted to one-seventh of the total wealth of the country. My belief is that that statement is somewhat exaggerated, but suffice it to say the total par value of the railroad stocks plus the par value of the bonds amounts in the aggregate to $17,336,300,619. But whether the ratio between the railroad wealth of the country and the total wealth of the country is one-seventh or one-tenth or one-twelfth, it presents one of the most tremendous propositions that ever commanded the attention of the Sanate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. If I may interrupt the Senator, the Senator has stated in a general way the total par value of railroad stock and the total par value of bonds. I should like to inquire if the Senator has gone into the question of the actual value of the stock and the actual value of the bonds; in other words, how much water is there in this stock and in these bonds?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the question is a very pertinent one, and I shall discuss it later on. I will pause long enough now, however, to say that there is no man in the United States who has accurate, definite, or intelligible knowledge upon that subject.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the bond value which the Senator in his statement places at par is, of course, par whenever the obligor is called upon to pay the securities. No matter how much the bonds may fluctuate in the open market between the time of their issue and the time of maturity, the fact remains that at maturity they are at par and the roads issuing them can not escape their payment, or at least adjudication upon that theory.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true.

Mr. President, I have no apology to make for the shortcomings of the railroads. I realize that they have done things in the past that they ought not to have done and left undone many things they should have done; I realize that in the past they have overcharged communities; that they have evaded taxes; that those who were in authority in the roads manipulated their stocks and the roads themselves to their own benefit and to the prejudice of the public; but, in my judgment, the Congress of the United States ought not to approach this subject now as if it were going to penalize the railroads, as they are at present organized for the wrongs which they committed many, many years ago.

When we speak of the railroads we must remember that the railroads of this country are owned by the people of this country. I have taken the pains to get a few figures indicating the extent to which the people are interested in this subject. I have received these figures from the Secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The reports of steam roads of class 1, those having an annual operating revenue of more than $1,000,000, for the year ending December 31, 1916, show the following: Number of stockholders, 503,833; number of shares held, 69,865,859 estimated of a par value of $100. Senators will note that this does not include the holdings of stock in railroads of class 2 or class 3. Those figures have not been furnished.

The number of bondholders is not shown in the reports of the carriers.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am trying to follow the Senator. He says that the railroads of class 1, which embrace railroads with an annual operating revenue of over a million dollars, have an ownership representing sixty-nine million——

Mr. POMERENE. Their stock is owned by 503,833 shareholders.

Mr. STONE. Shareholders to that number, with a total holding of $69,000,000?

Mr. POMERENE. No; 69,000,000 shares.

Mr. STONE. Sixty-nine million shares?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; and on a basis of $100 per share.

Mr. STONE. Well, what character of roads are in classes 2 and 3?

Mr. POMERENE. Class 2 embraces roads that have annual net operating revenues of less than $1,000,000 and over $100,000.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator cover them in his statement?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not have those figures; they have not been furnished me.

Mr. STONE. And class 3?

Mr. POMERENE. Class 3 includes those that have annual operating revenues under $100,000.

Mr. STONE. Well, they altogether are rather small in the aggregate, I imagine?

Mr. POMERENE. I should think so; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me, in the holdings the Senator, of course, includes those holdings which belong to insurance companies?

Mr. POMERENE. I assume so. I will have something to say in just a few moments on that subject.

In connection with the preceding it should be stated that while the gross amount of railway capital stock in the United States is over $9,000,000,000 the net amount not held by the railway companies was, on June 30, 1916, $6,314,570,354.

I am also furnished with the following extracts from Railway Statistics of the United States of America for the year ending December 31, 1916, prepared by Slason Thompson, of the Bureau of Railway News and Statistics:

Returns to this bureau for the year ended December, 1916, from 482 companies, operating 250,233 miles of line, report the number of stockholders at the last election prior to that date as 522,095. This is a decrease of 13,310 from the number reported six months before from a smaller mileage. It also marks the first recession in the number of stockholders in American railways since the bureau began its annual compilations.

As there are approximately 20,000 stockholders in the smaller operating companies, and two years ago the nonoperating roads reported 82,846 stockholders to the commission, it is apparent that the ownership of railways in the United States rests in the hands of approximately 620,000 stockholders.

The distribution of railway bonds is probably more general than that of railway stocks. Of course, not taking into account duplications, there must therefore be something over a million of individuals who are either owners of stock or owners of bonds.

At a meeting of the National Association of Owners of Railroad Securities held at Baltimore last May it was reported that the railroad securities owned were as follows:

By individuals outright, numbering about 1,000,000, owning over $10,000,000,000.

By life insurance companies, with 46,000,000 of policies in force, representing a total of $1,550,000,000.

By savings banks, with 10,000,000 depositors, representing $837,000,000.

I refer to these figures for this reason: We are not dealing fairly with this subject if we are going constantly to keep in mind the excesses of the railroads in the past and forget the fact that the railroads of this country are owned, directly and indirectly, by over a million people, and that these securities are in the hands of savings banks and insurance companies and in private safe-deposit boxes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I think his statement is a very modest statement when he states that number of owners directly and indirectly. I have seen the statement made, and apparently with considerable authenticity, that considerably over 10,000,000 people are directly and indirectly interested in railroad securities.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Michigan that I prefer to understate rather than to overstate the facts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Let me finish just this one thought, and then I will yield. I do it for the purpose of at least attempting to impress upon the minds of Senators that when they pare to the bone, they are striking at the savings of more than a million people in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I only wanted to say to the Senator that the source of my information is the source from which he has just quoted, namely, this Baltimore convention of railroad owners. I am well within bounds when I say that as the outgrowth of that convention, and the exchange of views therein made, it was shown that considerably over 10,000,000 people are directly and indirectly, as policyholders of insurance companies, and so forth, interested in this class of securities.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to add to what the Senator from Michigan has said relating to that subject that I think the statement made by the Senator from Ohio is much too modest to conform to the facts. The number of savings-bank depositors in the country would indicate that probably the Senator from Michigan is quite right in the statement that there are 10,000,000 people in the United States who are directly interested in railroad securities.

Mr. POMERENE. As I have said before, I am disposed to accept the statement made by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts; but in view of the returns which were made to the Interstate Commerce Commission I modified it, or stated the fact as I did.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the statement might be very much enlarged. Directly or indirectly, there are 100,000,000 people in the United States who are interested in railroad securities. But I ask the Senator from Ohio whether he understands that it is proposed by any one to reduce the compensation provided in this bill so that it will affect the interest upon bonds or the customary dividends upon stocks?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa—whose views are, I think, somewhat extreme—will bear with me a little while I will try to make myself perfectly clear as I go along.

The railway operating income for class 1 roads for the year 1917 was $1,061,814,427. For 1916 it was $1,024,381,299. For 1915 it was $716,476,186, the average being something over $934,223,970, which represents the proposed standard contained in section 1 of the bill. Some of the railway people insisted that we should use as the standard of compensation during the period of Government control the earnings of the year 1917. Others proposed as a method of compromise the use of the average earnings for the years 1917 and 1916, eliminating the earnings of 1915. Mr. Kruttschnitt, before the Interstate Commerce Committee, made the statement that if the average earnings for the years 1916 and 1917 were used as a standard for compensation it would give to the railroads of the country $109,000,000 annually more than they would get if we used the standard based upon the average for the three years.

The interest on the bonded debt of the railroads annually amounts to about $400,000,000. The dividends paid to the stockholders in 1915 were $259,809,520; in 1916, $281,936,371; and for the fiscal year 1917 I do not have the exact figures, but they amount to over $300,000,000. If we were to pay to the railroads during the first year the same dividends that the railroads paid during the last year, and the interest account was the same, there would still remain a sum of about $200,000,000 which would go to surplus.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will allow me, I have just gotten from the Interstate Commerce Commission a memorandum on the very point that he now has under discussion. It states that in connection with the table furnished the Senator from Iowa and others as to the probable $200,000,000 that would be available for surplus it must be borne in mind, among other things, that the amount of outstanding stock will be that of 1918, and that no average can be taken in that respect, and that the probabilities are that the outstanding stock would be larger than any average for the three years; and that computation was made upon the basis of the average outstanding stock for three years, which is manifestly incorrect.

Mr. POMERENE. The Interstate Commerce Committee sought to get information relative to the market value of stocks and bonds from the Interstate Commerce Commission. We were unable to get this information complete or exact. The Interstate Commerce Commission, however, gave us the following information concerning stocks of steam roads which were quoted on the New York Stock Exchange for the years indicated, as shown by the Financial Chronicle.

The par value of the stocks quoted for the year 1912 was $4,574,587,200; for 1915, $4,741,422,100; and on December 14, 1917, $4,790,851,200.

I wish Senators to note the market value of these stocks.

For 1912 the market value was $5,035,839,506; for 1915, $4,485,433,601; and on December 14, 1917, $3,786,001,000.

Now, note the percentages of the market value to par value.

In 1912 the percentage of market value to par value of these stocks was 110.08; in 1915, 94.60; and on December 14, 1917, 79.03.

The par value of the stocks quoted, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission, as above given, constitutes 79.34 per cent for 1912, 75.09 per cent for 1916, and 75.87 per cent for 1917 of the total par value of stocks for all steam roads—classes 1 and 2 and nonoperating subsidiaries—in the hands of the public. The market value of these stocks was determined by striking an average between the highest and the lowest quotations during the year, as shown by the Financial Chronicle. This average was assumed to be a mean quotation for the year, and was applied to the par to obtain the market value.

It is interesting to observe that while these stocks in 1912 were quoted at 110.08 per cent, or 10.8 per cent above par, in 1917 they were quoted at 79.03 per cent, or 20.97 per cent below par—a shrinkage from 1912 to 1917 of 31.05 per cent.

The Interstate Commerce Commission also gave us the following par and market values of stocks for 1912, 1916, and 1917:

The par values of stocks of all steam roads—classes 1 and 2 and nonoperating subsidiaries—in the hands of the public on June 30 were as follows:

Nineteen hundred and twelve, $5,766,093,888; 1916, $6,314,570,354; and 1917, though larger in sum, for the purposes of this argument they are estimated at the same amount.

The market value of these same stocks, determined by applying the percentage in the first table referred to, was as follows:

Market value, 1912, $6,347,316,152; 1916, $5,973,583,555; but in 1917 they had shrunk to $4,990,404,951.

The commission also furnished us the par value and the market value of the railroad bonds, and these valuations apply to issues of $10,000,000 or more outstanding.

The par value of the bonds quoted for 1912 was $5,466,060,876; for 1916, $5,705,932,750; and December 14, 1917, $6,127,816,350.

The market value of these bonds in 1912 was $5,089,923,953; in 1916, $5,086,381,475; and December 14, 1917, $5,156,623,981.

The percentage of the market value of these bonds to the par value in 1912 was 93.12 per cent; in 1916 89.14 per cent; and on December 14, 1917, 84.15 per cent.

The par value of bonds of all steam roads for 1912 was $9,321,506,762; for 1916, $10,021,730,075; for 1917, $10,021,730,075 (estimated).

The market values for these same years were as follows: 1912, $8,680,187,097; 1916, $8,933,370,193; and 1917, $8,433,285,862.

Now, as to the comparative value of all these stocks and bonds, the par value of all the stocks and bonds of these same classes of railroads for 1912 was $15,087,600,650; the market value, $15,027,503,249. For 1916 the par value was $16,336,300,429, the market value $14,906,953,748; and in 1917, though the par value of the stocks and bonds was $16,336,300,429 (estimated), the market value was only $13,423,690,813.

Senators should note that the par value of the stock and bonds for the year 1917 is estimated to be the same that it was in 1916. It certainly is not less in amount. So the par value of these stocks and bonds increased between 1912 and 1917 $1,248,699,779, and notwithstanding this increase in the par value of these stocks and bonds the market value of the same stocks and bonds decreased from 1912 to 1917 $1,603,812,436.

Mr. President, the other day a very distinguished lawyer and business man was in my office discussing this very subject, and he told me that a few days before he had seen the balance sheet of one of the great colleges of the country. The college authorities had bought certain railroad stocks of a high class at $1.13. At the time he saw the balance sheet these stocks had fallen to less than 60 cents. If we will remember this decline in market values as affecting the financial conditions of the business institutions of the country, the insurance companies, the savings banks and savings societies, we can understand what this tremendous shrinkage in values means.

We talk about the payment of a "just compensation" by the Government to the railroads for the use of their property, and I have yet failed to find anyone who does not believe that a "just compensation" should be paid. But we differ radically when we try to determine the rule by which this shall be done or what in fact shall be a just compensation. If I were to be guided by the argument which I have heard here on the floor of the Senate, I would come to the conclusion that we had forgotten entirely that we were dealing with the public, but thought we were dealing solely with some railroads that had robbed communities in the past. But let us see how far we can go in determining the question as to what is a just compensation, and I want briefly to discuss the law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will it annoy the Senator if I express the hope which I had that after he had demonstrated the tremendous shrinkage in the values of railroad securities and stocks he would give his judgment as to the causes for that shrinkage?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I have considered that, but I had not intended to go into the causes. I was going to treat the present state as an established fact without going into those details, because this legislation deals with an established condition which we hope to improve.

Thus far in the argument we see that while the traffic of the roads has very materially increased, and promises to further increase in the future, the equipment of the roads has declined and values of railroad securities have shrunk to a point where the safety of financial institutions has been threatened.

It is the purpose of those who are opposing the bill, as evidenced by the several amendments proposed by the Senator from Iowa, to refuse to allow the railroads anything over and above the dividends that they declared during the past year. The title to all moneys earned over and above these dividends are to be passed to the Government. The Government is to have authority to invest these earnings, over and above these dividends, either in railroad property or turn them into the Treasury. And if these funds are thus invested in property connected with the roads earning them, or other properties, they are not to be capitalized, the improvements are to belong absolutely to the public, and there will be no returns to the company because of these investments. In my judgment, the Congress has no authority whatsoever to adopt such a course of action in fixing compensation to be paid. While these roads are public utilities, and as such are subject to the control of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution, they are, nevertheless, private property. True, they are owned by corporations, but the stock in these corporations is owned by individuals, and a certificate of stock which each stockholder has in a company represents his interest in that property just as surely as a fee-simple deed represents his interest in the property that he owns.

And now I think it will be conceded that, so far as the exercise of eminent domain is concerned, there is little or no distinction between the seizing and taking over of individually owned property and railroad owned property. The fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides—nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

The President, under the authority of Congress, has taken over the railroads, and every student of the subject must admit that the Government is not only in honor bound but legally bound to pay to the owners a "just compensation."

I shall beg the indulgence of the Senate while I refer to the opinion of the Supreme Court in Monongahela Navigation Co. versus United States, One hundred and forty-eighth United States, 312. Congress had authorized the Secretary of War to purchase at a given price the upper lock and dam and its appurtenances, belonging to the Monongahela Navigation Co., a Pennsylvania corporation. If he could not make a voluntary purchase he was authorized to begin condemnation proceedings for this property, but the act of Congress provided that in estimating the sum to be paid the franchise of said corporation, which was derived from the State of Pennsylvania, was not to be taken into consideration or estimated. The efforts of a voluntary purchase failed. Viewers were appointed, who reported the value of the lock and dam, but it did not take into account "the franchise of the company to collect tolls."

That is what some of our very good friends are forgetting now, to take into consideration the rights which the commerce act and the Interstate Commerce Commission have given to these railroads to collect toll. The navigation company having received its franchise from the State of Pennsylvania, constructed at great expense locks and dams and had a right to charge tolls for carrying traffic. The right to take property is not denied, but this right is accompanied by a corresponding duty to pay a just compensation for it. In the act referred to, Congress exercised the right to determine the measure of damages. The Supreme Court held this to be a "judicial and not a legislative question."

Says Mr. Justice Brewer:

It does not rest with the public taking of property, through Congress or the legislature, its representative, to say what compensation shall be paid, or even what shall be the rule of compensation. The Constitution has declared that just compensation shall be paid and the ascertainment of that is a judicial inquiry.

So all we can do here as a legislative body is to establish a rule for the guidance of the President beyond which he shall not go. We can not force these railroads to accept this plan.

In discussing this question further, the learned justice says:

The value of property, generally speaking, is determined by its productiveness—the profits which its use brings to the owner.

So in determining what is just compensation we must take into consideration what were the profits that these railroads earned, if any, immediately prior to their being taken over by the Government.

Again, Mr. Justice Brewer said:

The value (of the property) therefor is not determined by the mere cost of construction, but more by what the completed structure brings in the way of earnings to its owner. For each separate use of one's property by others the owner is entitled to a reasonable compensation, and the number and amount of such uses determine the productiveness of the property, and, therefore, largely its value.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania had granted the Monongahela Navigation Co. the right to use this property and fixed the terms thereof—

The prices which may be exacted under this legislative grant of authority are the tolls, and these tolls, in the nature of the case, must enter into and largely determine the matter of value.

So if we apply the logic of the case from which I am reading to the present bill, after the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed these rates, presumably at least until they are set aside, and, presumptively, they are just and reasonable, we must take them into consideration in fixing a "just compensation" for the property taken.

On page 336 the learned justice says:

And if that property be improved under authority of a charter granted by the State, that the franchise to take tolls for the use of the improvement, in order to determine the just compensation, such franchise must be taken into account.

So we must take into account the rates which have been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the profits therefrom.

Because Congress has the power to take the property, it does not follow that it may destroy the franchise without compensation. Whatever is the true value of that which he takes from an individual owner must be paid to him before it can be said that just compensation for the property has been paid. And what is true in respect to the condemnation of property for a post office is equally true when condemnation is sought for improving a natural highway.

If we were condemning a building for the purpose of a site for a post office, would it not be proper for the jury and the court which was passing upon the question to take into consideration the rental of that property? So also when it comes to a determination of the rent which the Government must pay for these railroads we must consider their earnings.

And now let us apply the reasoning of the case just cited to the railway legislation now under consideration. Some of these properties have been earning 5, 6, and 8 per cent, a few of them 10 per cent, on their capital stock, and a very few others very much more. They are charging rates for traffic which have been found to be fair and reasonable by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by the several State commissions. Until these rates shall have been changed by this organization or the Government the owners of the railways will continue to make these charges. They were making them at the time the President stepped in and took control under the act of Congress. And the question is, What is the value for the use of these roads? How are we to determine it? Shall it be controlled by the mere ipse dixit of a few men who may have some extreme views on the subject of railroad control or Government ownership which they have never been able to force upon the public? Shall just compensation be determined in harmony with the principles of legislation and sound railroad management and as reflected by railroad earnings, or shall they be determined by some principles, right or wrong, which have never found expression by any Government tribunal having jurisdiction thereof? We are not the sole arbiters of this so-called "insoluble question," as it was referred to the other day by the Senator from Iowa. We may as a legislative body reduce rates either by direct legislation or indirectly through the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but we can not appropriate profits already earned or injure or destroy franchise rights which have already vested. These profits, if earned on franchises authorizing earnings, are private property, and we must pay for them a just compensation and the courts will determine the amount thereof, if it can not be adjusted by negotiation.

And now, sirs, if a property has been earning 25 per cent for its owners, whether corporate or individual, it seems to me that the burden of proof is on those who contend for the right to reduce it to 6 per cent to show the method whereby it can be done. Neither can the Government take these surplus earnings and invest them in betterments and say to the railroads, "You shall have neither the title to these betterments nor be permitted to have the earnings thereof." While the railroads of the country have been permitted to make certain charges, if, by reason of increased business or efficient management, they may be able to earn a little more than some of their neighbors, is that a reason why we should confiscate them or appropriate them for public use?

The Senators who take that position overlook this fact. Assume, for the sake of the argument, that a railroad under current rates established by the Interstate Commerce Commission is earning a bare 6 per cent for dividends. It is reaching out trying to serve the community. By means of its efficiency, perhaps by means of the industry of its officers and employees, it increases the traffic so that the stockholders can get 7 per cent. Have they violated their duty to the public or their duty to the stockholders? Are they to be penalized because they are serving a greater number of the public than they did before? If that is to be the rule which is to control railroad management, then when railroad companies get to the point where they earn a bare 6 per cent it would be most natural for them to sit back in their easy chairs and let the road go to wreck.

Mr. President, the total stocks and bonds, as I have heretofore stated, amount to $17,336,300,619. You will pardon me for repeating it, because I want to make my point perfectly clear, if I can. Upon that great aggregation of property there is paid each year $400,000,000 of interest on bonds and $300,000,000 in dividends on stocks. The total net average earnings during the three years 1915, 1916, and 1917 was a fraction over $900,000,000, but for the sake of argument let us say that it amounted to an even $900,000,000. That leaves $200,000,000 to go to the surplus.

What should be done with this? The Senator from Iowa tells us that it is taking from the people $200,000,000 to which the roads are not entitled. There is not any man living who can tell me whether a given amount of earnings is excessive or not, unless he can first tell me what the value of the property is. The total of the stocks and bonds of the railroads is $17,000,000,000. Who knows whether it is too low or too high? No one knows; but the Senator from Iowa says that $200,000,000 is excessive. Now, let us analyze the situation and see whether he is justified in drawing that conclusion.

We have a bureau connected with the Interstate Commerce Commission that has been working for three years to value the railroads, and they tell us that it will take three years more to complete the work. Judge Prouty was before our committee. He has charge of this valuation. I was anxious to get from him a judgment, if I could get it, as to what was the probable value of these railroads. You would think, if there were any man in the whole United States who could give us a fair judgment as to what the probable value of the railroads is that Judge Prouty could do it; but he would not even venture to guess at it. I do not want to misrepresent this matter; I want to get it just exactly as it came from his lips, and so I will read his statement. He was asked by the Senator from Iowa:

> From your long experience on the Interstate Commerce Commission and your subsequent work as the head of the Bureau of Valuation will you please state to the committee whether it can place reliance upon the property investment account as shown by the reports of the railway companies?

Mr. Prouty answered—

> Now, the investment accounts of the railway companies of this country are absolutely unreliable. In some cases it is pretty near the fact and in other cases nowhere near the fact. The investment account as a rule balances with the stock and bond issues. That is not an invariable rule, but it is a pretty general rule. The railroads have adjusted their investment account so as to take care of their securities.
> Take, for example, the investment account of the Kansas City Southern, the cost of reproduction there was perhaps $50,000,000; their investment account was some $90,000,000, as I remember it. We may take some other railroad where the investment account would run pretty close to the cost of reproduction, and I expect you will find cases where the investment account would be less than the cost of reproduction. We have not found any cases of that sort yet.

Later in the examination I asked the following question:

> Senator POMERENE. Would you care to venture an opinion as to what was the probable actual value of these railroad properties?
> Mr. PROUTY. Senator, that would be the wildest sort of a guess.

He has been studying this proposition and doing nothing else for over three years, and up to date that bureau has completed the valuation of but three roads. There are between 600 and 700 systems of railroads in this country. This man, the best-informed man in the United States on that subject, when asked for an opinion, says:

> That would be the wildest sort of a guess. I would not object to giving an opinion if there was any basis for it; but there is absolutely no basis for that opinion.

And yet, while the ablest man in the United States on this subject tells us that he can not give us the value of this property, my very good friend from Iowa, for whom I have the profoundest respect so far as motives are concerned, and most often so far as his judgment is concerned, has not yet ventured to give the Senate an opinion of his own as to the value of these roads, and yet he charges that those who champion the method which is contained in the committee bill are guilty, as it were, of some high crime or misdemeanor because they say that they are willing to give to the railroads a compensation which is $200,000,000 more than the distinguished Senator from Iowa is willing to give.

If I were to say to Senators, "Guess at the value of these railroads," and one should guess $16,000,000,000, another should guess $18,000,000,000, and another should guess $19,000,000,000, and assume, for the sake of the argument, that the actual value is $16,000,000,000, the Senator who guessed $19,000,000,000 would only be $3,000,000,000 out of the way, or, in other words, three-sixteenths out of the way. That would be a pretty fair guess; but, if instead of these properties being worth $16,000,000,000, the amount of their stock and bonds, they were, in fact, worth $19,000,000,000, 6 per cent interest on the difference, namely, $3,000,000,000, would be $180,000,000, within $20,000,000 of this excessive amount which the Senator from Iowa claims we are proposing to pay for the use of this property. It is not possible for any living man to tell whether this amount is excessive or not until he first knows what the investment is.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very much interested in the Senator's address, and I should like his opinion, for he has studied the problem and has heard the testimony. As I understand the bill, it does not provide that the President shall agree with the railroads for the maximum amount stated in the bill, so the President might, by negotiation, if he were able to get a lower rental fixed by the railroads, fix a lower amount than the maximum. I should like the Senator's opinion as to whether the President is likely to try to get a smaller compensation fixed than the maximum which is provided in the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire is asking a question which it is impossible for me to answer. Frankly, I do not know; but knowing the President as I do, I am confident that if he found that the standard here was too high as to any of these roads, he would not take the money of the public and turn it over to these companies or their stockholders.

The Senator's question suggests this further thought to me. Let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that here is a railroad that has been earning during the last three years an average of 8 per cent, that another railroad has been earning 6 per cent on the average, and another railroad 10 per cent on the average, what should be the position of the directors of those roads, or of the lawyers advising the directors of them, when it comes to weighing their responsibility to the stockholders whose money and whose property is in their keeping? I recognize the fact that 6 per cent is a pretty fair return, if it is guaranteed and is continued on for an unlimited time, but it is one thing to determine the rule for guidance for his own individual conduct with respect to his own individual property, and it is another thing when in the capacity of a trustee he is acting and advising for his cestui que trust.

I am satisfied that we might go at the present time to the four corners of the earth and it would be absolutely impossible for us to get a statement now as to the actual value of the railroad property. The other day when I picked up a copy of the minority report submitted by the senior Senator from Iowa and saw his statement of the dividends which were paid by some of these railroads on their capital stock, I confess that I was somewhat shocked; but a little further careful examination into the facts of the case demonstrated conclusively that the information he had given was misleading. I want to say, lest I be misunderstood, that of course the Senator from Iowa would not purposely mislead, but he was misled by some of the statisticians.

The able Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] took up some of the more extreme cases and gave us some additional facts which cast additional light upon this subject. In order that the RECORD may show them in a more concise form I want to repeat: According to the statement submitted by the Senator from Iowa, the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Co. earned for its stockholders 647.22 per cent on its capital stock of $500,000, but he failed to call attention to the value of the road. The property of this road, however, for the year ending June 30, 1916, had a valuation of $45,359,056; in other words, this railroad, which was represented as earning 647.22 per cent on its capital stock, only earned on the property investment a little over 10 per cent.

The Chicago & Erie Railroad, which the Senator from Iowa claims to have earned 70.45 per cent on its capital stock, in fact earned less than 1 per cent on its property investment.

The New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Co., which he claims earned 35.74 per cent on its capital stock, in fact only earned 9 per cent on its proposed standard return on the property investment.

The Cumberland Valley Railroad, which he claims earned 24.01 per cent on its capital stock, in fact on the property investment only earned 8.4 per cent according to the proposed standard return.

The Lehigh & Hudson River Railway Co., which he says earned 27.98 per cent on its capital stock, on its property investment is only earning 8.4 per cent under the proposed standard.

The Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Co., which he claims earned 21.67 per cent on its capital stock, in fact only earns 5.8 per cent on its property investment under the proposed standard return.

The Duluth, Missabe & Northern Railway Co., according to the figures of the Senator from Iowa, earned 114.12 per cent on its capital stock, while in fact on its property investment it would earn under the proposed standard return 14.93 per cent.

The Duluth & Iron Range Railroad Co., according to his statement, earned 38.27 per cent on its capital stock, while on its property investment under the proposed standard return it would earn 8.76 per cent.

The Panhandle & Santa Fe Railroad Co., which he claims earned 64.37 per cent on its capital stock, will earn under the proposed standard 6.3 per cent.

The St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co., which he claims earned 52.71 per cent on its capital stock, which is reported at $500,000, while the property investment appears as more than $15,000,000, earns on the actual property investment 1.757 per cent.

The Colorado & Wyoming Railway Co., which he says earned 162.64 per cent, under the proposed standard return would only earn a little over 7 per cent.

The Senator from Iowa followed the Senator from Minnesota in an elaborate speech. He has neither denied nor qualified any of these facts as given by the Senator from Minnesota, and I shall assume, therefore, that they state the truth and can not be denied.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator is giving some very interesting statistics as to these roads. Take a concrete case. The Senator states that the capital stock of a certain railroad is $500,000, while the valuation or the capital actually invested is $15,000,000. Will the Senator indicate where that extra value comes from?

Mr. POMERENE. I can only indicate. Special examinations into property values, and so forth, were made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, at least as to some of these roads, so as to determine the fairness or unfairness of rates.

Mr. STONE. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me a moment; and it turns out that one of these roads which I now have in mind, the Bessemer & Lake Erie, is substantially a privately owned road, used for the purpose of transporting ore from Lake Erie ports to the furnaces and coal and coke from the Pittsburgh district to the Lakes, and that its property was valued by the Interstate Commerce Commission at $45,359,056.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. What constitutes capital stock is easily ascertained.

Mr. POMERENE. Surely.

Mr. STONE. What constitutes actual capital invested in the property is more difficult to ascertain. I do not care to press an inquiry as to individual cases. The Senator's data may not be sufficient to cover the particulars of all these cases; but just what does the Senator mean in the distinction he makes between authorized capital stock and actual investment in the property? Secondly, I should like the Senator to tell me—I may be the only Senator here who needs to make the inquiry, but I make it—just what he means by the standard of value upon which the Government is to make compensation?

Mr. POMERENE. By the standard return or value we mean as determined by the first section of this bill, which authorizes the President, if the bill becomes a law, to strike an average of the earnings for the fiscal years 1915, 1916, and 1917, and then to enter into an adjustment with these railroads which shall not be in excess of that average.

The Senator asks me about the property investment of these companies. Many of these companies have invested a large amount of money in their properties which is not represented by the capital stock. To illustrate, one of the busiest little roads in the country is the Bessemer & Lake Erie, with a capital stock of $500,000; but the investigation—and there was a special investigation made as to the value of that property—showed that it had an investment there of $45,000,000 and over.

Mr. STONE. In what way represented?

Mr. POMERENE. By the right of way, rolling stock, and so forth. The Senator from Missouri, perhaps, was not in the Chamber the other day when the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] rose and stated that he had organized that company for the owners, and that they owned 8 or 9 miles of railroad. I do not pretend to be exact as to its length, but they operated over 200 miles of railroad, and they had this tremendous investment in the form of rolling stock and other equipment which was necessary to carry the iron ore from the lake ports down to the furnaces in and about Pittsburgh and coal and coke from the coal regions up to the lake for shipment to the Northwest. I have in mind in my own State an instance where a large property, amounting in value to three or four hundred thousand dollars, a manufacturing plant, was owned by a corporation with a capital stock of only $10,000. At that time, under our constitution, we had a double stock liability, and those who had their money invested were quite willing to run the hazards of the business, but they did not care to incur the double stock liability if failure should come on.

So that it does not necessarily follow that there is any relation whatsoever between capital stock and the money or property invested. It is true that some years ago, before the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State public utility commissions were organized, many of these companies were overcapitalized. Of course, that is an offense against good, sound financing, but that is a thing of the past. These railroads, however, have continued to grow in value, and while my distinguished friend, the Senator from Iowa, suggests, for instance, that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. is now earning something over 8 per cent on its capitalization, I venture to say that he can not give an intelligent guess as to what is the actual value of its property, and therefore is not in a position to say whether the earnings of the road are excessive or not.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, when the Senator says "the actual value," he means the actual investment in the property?

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps we can distinguish between the two, and perhaps we can not. If, by "investment," we mean simply the actual money that has been placed in it, that may be the value, and it may not. There is the increased value of these terminals all the while. It may be that the increase in value comes out of undistributed surplus. It may be that it is a so-called unearned increment. I do not know; but we can not by any present legislation cure all the ills that railroad flesh has been heir to in the last half century without doing great injustice to present innocent stockholders or bondholders.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. The question that is evidently disturbing the Senator from Missouri, as it is disturbing me, is this: Where has the additional capital investment come from?

Now, it occurs to me that it may come from three sources. One, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, is perhaps the unearned increment, the increased value of the right of way, terminal facilities, real estate, or anything that it may own. In the second place, it may arise from money borrowed on bonds and invested in the property, and that would be good business—to borrow money at 4 or 5 per cent and put it where it may earn 10 or 15 per cent. But the third, and probably the greatest, source of this increased capital is earnings of the past that have not been paid out in dividends, but have been reinvested in the property.

I will ask the Senator if that is not correct?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the Senator has substantially stated the sources of this increase; and I am not prepared to say to-day, as a fundamental principle of railroad economics, that it is either right or wrong to capitalize surplus earnings. It may be that we will get to the point where we will not want that done; but this is not the time to write in the statute books all these economic reforms, however dear they may be to the ideas of some economists. It must be borne in mind that although during the last few years the railroads have done more business than ever before, and although their earnings during the last two years are greater in dollars and cents than ever before, their equipment to-day is less; and notwithstanding these great earnings the market value of the stocks and bonds has depreciated from 20 to 30 per cent—enough to wipe out the surplus of many of the great financial institutions of the country. Permit me to say, with all due respect, that it is our duty, if we can, to stabilize the value of these securities and not pare down to the bone.

Now, let me call your attention to another matter.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] made the statement that under this proposed plan we would pay $200,000,000 more than we ought to pay. I have indicated pretty clearly that neither he nor anyone else can give us the valuation of this property, so that he can not tell whether we are paying too much for it or not; but assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the value of these properties is substantially the par value of the bonds plus the par value of the stock, that would make the valuation $17,336,300,619.

It is clear that in some instances the actual investment is less than the par value of the stocks and bonds. In others they are approximately equal. In some others the property is in excess of the stocks and bonds. Assuming that the property value of the roads is equal to the stocks and bonds, then this so-called excessive $200,000,000 which the Senator from Iowa contends the Government will pay under the plan of the committee bill would only amount annually to 1.15 per cent of the entire investment. Admit that to be so; we speak of $200,000,000 as if it were a tremendous sum, and it is; but when you distribute that $200,000,000 over the entire property investment, it only means 1.15 per cent of the total value.

But, Senators, I want to present this at another angle, if I may.

When we speak of a given sum of money we can regard it as a pretty good yardstick by which to determine values during normal times. But if, perchance, the purchasing value of the dollar has decreased, then it is not so safe a guide. Now, let me give you some facts indicating the increases in the cost of railroad supplies. These figures were presented to us in the committee. Assume the value of these different articles during the year 1897 to be $100, and make that a standard of comparison:

Bridge timbers, in 1897 valued at $100, in 1908 were valued at $157 and in 1917 at $175.

Railroad ties, in 1897 valued at $100, in 1908 were valued at $175 and in 1917 at $225.

Steel rails, valued in 1897 at $100, in 1908 were worth $149 and in 1917 $213.

Bar iron, in 1897 worth $100, in 1908 was worth $139 and in 1917 $301.

Car journal bearings, worth $100 in 1897, in 1908 were worth $124, and in 1917, $261.

Heavy freight engines, which before August, 1914, cost from $28,000 to $32,000, 18 months prior to these hearings in January of this year cost $46,000. The builders' estimated cost during the past year was $85,000. Due to the price fixing of steel, the railroads expect to get these engines at $60,000 to $65,000. In other words, they cost now substantially twice as much as they did before August, 1914.

Freight cars, that cost before August, 1914, $1,000 to $1,100, since the price of steel was fixed are quoted at $2,350.

Oil-tank cars, which before the war cost $1,200 to $1,400, now cost $3,300 to $3,600.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. STONE. May I ask the Senator if the railroads have been increasing their equipment to any appreciable degree on the higher-priced commodities and cars since the prices have gone up to the heights mentioned?

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President. In many instances they have attempted to make the increase, and perhaps have made some increases. I can not give the Senator exact information on that subject. Suffice it to say that they have let their contracts for a large number of locomotives; but the locomotive builders were not able to furnish them even at these high prices, because under the direction of the Government they were furnishing locomotives to Great Britain, France, and Russia for war purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not hear the Senator say anything about the increased cost of fuel.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or labor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or labor. Has the Senator touched upon that question?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not touched upon that question, but I think we are all pretty well aware that the cost of fuel has been very much higher than it was prior to the beginning of the war, and wages in many branches of the service have been advanced.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I presume the facts to be that some of the railroads had laid in large quantities, in fact their normal supply, of fuel, perhaps at a slightly increased cost; but in most instances I have a very strong impression that the scarcity and the high price of fuel seriously affected the question of cost.

Mr. POMERENE. It has affected the railroads just as it has affected every other industry.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator's figures comparing the cost of railroad material between 1897 and 1917 rather startled me; certainly two or three items did. Could the Senator, without trouble, read from his notes the difference in the cost of steel rails during that period?

Mr. POMERENE. I did not give the exact figures; I was giving percentages. Assuming the price in 1897 to be $100, in 1908 the price would be $149 and in 1917, $213.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator. I was laboring under a misapprehension. I thought he was giving the cost per ton.

Mr. POMERENE. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, as a matter of fact, the price has more than doubled during that period?

Mr. POMERENE. It has more than doubled.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. It occurred to me that if it was the cost in dollars some explanation ought to be given, because it startled me to think that such an increase could possibly have occurred.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The increase in the cost of material is well known, but I ask the Senator whether it is not true that the net railway operating income for the year ending June 30, 1917, was not the largest in the history of the roads?

Mr. POMERENE. There is no question about it. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. That being true, the future increase in the cost of these materials or supplies, whatever they may be, so long as the Government has control, will not affect the standard return at all, will it?

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the Senator any information going to show that the expenditure for betterments and upkeep has been as large as in the previous years?

Mr. POMERENE. I have no data on that subject at all, but it has been large.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then the Senator desires the statement to stand that notwithstanding the tremendous increase in the cost of supplies and of fuel and of labor and the practically stationary rate for their income, they have made more net profits under such circumstances than in any preceding period?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I have not already made it clear I want it understood that my comparison was based upon the fiscal years 1915, 1916, and 1917. There has been a tremendous increase in the amount of traffic on the eastern roads. Since that time there have been considerable increases in the price of wage and the price of railroad supplies. I am not able to state what that effect will be upon the net returns since June 30, 1917, but I think they will show a substantial decrease.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a question there. No matter what those increases may have been, they do not affect the amount which the Government guarantees to the railroads?

Mr. POMERENE. After the agreement is entered into they do not.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is true, is it not, that we have proposed as a standard the average of the three years 1915, 1916, and 1917, and when that standard is applied to the earnings of those years a certain fixed amount is reached which we guarantee, and so far as all the period after July 30, 1917, is concerned the Government bears the increase in the cost of supplies and materials, no matter what it may cost——

Mr. POMERENE. I can make that perfectly clear in a word, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. CUMMINS. I felt sure the Senator from Michigan did not fully understand the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If the bill becomes a law and the President agrees to pay a given rate—$100 per year—during the period of Government control, it will have to pay that $100 per year whether the price of coal or iron or steel goes up or down. I think that states the situation. The purpose of it is to arrive at some sort of an agreement which will be fair to the railroads and put an end to this uncertainty.

I have gone into the question of prices, and so forth, more particularly with this purpose in mind, among others, that we speak of allowing the railroads an excessive sum, and when we measure it by the value of the things that the railroads have to buy it is not half as much as it seems.

Now, Mr. President, there is just another thought.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I am still in a state of confusion about one thing after listening to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Iowa. The basis of the Government compensation, called the standard basis or return, rests upon the average of the last three years. Is that correct?

Mr. POMERENE. That is the rule. That is the yardstick that we authorize the President to take up.

Mr. STONE. To measure the compensation by?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; that is, he may not go above that.

Mr. STONE. As I caught the argument of the Senator from Iowa, the greater part of which I had the pleasure of listening to and a part of which I was deprived of hearing for reasons beyond my control, his argument was that the Government compensation would be based for the average year of the three years upon capital stock, while the Senator from Ohio contends that instead of that it shall be predicated upon the actual value of the property, and the Senator cited some striking examples. Now, I want to know just what the bill means in that respect.

Mr. POMERENE. I can make my position clear. As far as the Senator from Iowa is concerned, I am sorry the Senator from Iowa was not present to hear the part of the argument referring to this subject. I do not think I misstated his position, and I am not going into the argument now, except to say that the difference, in brief, between the Senator from Iowa and myself is this: He states that after paying all expenses and the interest on the bonded debt under this standard contained in section 1 of the bill we will be paying the railroads too high a return on the capital stock. My contention is that neither he nor I nor anyone else in the United States has any accurate notion as to what the value of these railroads is.

Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the valuation is somewhat near the sum total of bonds plus stock, then the return which the Senator from Iowa says is excessive when based upon capital stock will be very much less when based upon property investment, if stock and bonds represent anything like the amount of property invested. But we must agree that many of these railroads are overcapitalized. Some of them have a capitalization which, with the bonds, represent the substantial value of the roads. There are still others that have property accounts, actual investments, in excess of both stocks and bonds. That, I think, will indicate the difference between the Senator from Iowa and myself.

Mr. President, I want to say just a few words with respect to the time the Government control shall terminate. I refer particularly to section 13 of the bill. The bill as originally presented to the committee provided that Government control should last during the period of the war and until such time thereafter as Congress might otherwise direct. The bill as reported to the Senate by the committee in that behalf provides that it shall not continue longer than 18 months after the war terminates.

I recognize the fact that there is a wide difference of opinion not only among members of the committee but among Senators and others as to what we should do after the war is over. I personally would have preferred that we end Government control within six months after the war ends. My belief is that no matter how badly the railroads may have conducted themselves in the past we are to deal with them as they now are. Congress could not take over the railroads at all except as a war measure, and, in my judgment, that means during the period of the war, and at least for a reasonable time thereafter; beyond that we should not attempt to go. The railroad companies and their stockholders and their bondholders and the entire United States are interested in this subject, and, while the railroads in many respects have not done what they ought to have done, my belief is that they have played a great part in the development of this country and the men, women, and children who have their money invested in these railroads have a right to be dealt with fairly, even at the hands of Congress.

That which depressed the value of stocks and bonds was the uncertainty of the future so far as Government control was concerned. If the roads should break down, what would the Government do? Would it do nothing and leave them to the tender mercies of war conditions, thereby crippling transportation and depressing the values of these securities? Or would the Congress do something to help them and thereby assure to them a reasonable return while the Government was controlling them and directing traffic?

I am not here to discuss the question of Government ownership or private ownership or the merits or demerits of either system. I care not from what standpoint we look at this question, whether it be from the standpoint of the advocate of Government ownership or from the standpoint of one who insists upon private ownership and control. What does honor require us to do with these railroads? They are not Congress's property; they belong to the stockholders and the bondholders. Are we doing the right thing when we take possession of these roads through the exercise of the war arm of this Government, and at the same time to say to them and those interested financially in them, "Oh, yes; we took your property as a war measure, and now that we have it we will do with it as we choose?" Ought we keep these railroads until some other Congress that believes in interminable and unlimited debate shall determine when we will let go? That is the proposition. What effect would such a course have on the value of these securities? Let me illustrate.

Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that we have a large corporation. Perhaps by reason of differences of opinions among the stockholders it has been thrown into the hands of a receiver. Or it may be for some other cause. The receiver holds the property. Stockholders and bondholders are interested in it. The officers of the corporation are also interested in it. If they have real estate rented the tenants are interested in it. All these people want to know whether the tenants shall continue to occupy the premises; and if so, for how long. They want to know whether the principal and interest on the bonds are to be paid; and if so, when? And the stockholders want to know whether they are going to get dividends or not. Perhaps those interested want to sell their bonds or their stock, and when prospective purchasers go to inquire they find the company and its property are involved in endless litigation. No one can tell when the end of that litigation is going to come and no one will buy either the bonds or the stocks or rent that property so long as there is that uncertainty about it. Does it not affect values?

Now, apply that thought to the bill here before us. Some men may be interested in Government ownership and think that this will be an opportunity by which to bring it about. Other men, because they may have some feeling of distrust with respect to private control or may want to get even with railroad companies, may want to delay legislation. Some Senators who are absolutely confident of the soundness of their views concerning principles of legislation to be enacted and yet may never be able to get anybody else to agree with them will be interested in holding up this legislation and preventing its final disposition. Meanwhile the railroad organizations do not know what to do. The stockholders do not know whether it is to be Government control or private control, and the bondholders know nothing about it. Is there anyone who will take the position that, behedged by all these uncertainties, we are adding anything to the value of these stocks and bonds?

But whether it does have that effect or not, if these railroads belonged to the common criminals of this country they have the right to know what their Congress is going to do with their property.

It seems to me—and I say it with due respect to the very able men who differ from me—I have not yet heard one sound reason in favor of an unlimited control for an unlimited time of these railroads, particularly when we have taken them over as a war measure. If it is the judgment of the majority of the Senators here and of Congress that Government control should be continued or that we should have Government ownership, do not the principles of common fairness and honesty suggest that the Congress shall tell them now what they are going to do so that they may get their house in order? Those, briefly stated, are my reasons for fixing a limit for Government control now in this bill.

Mr. STONE. May I ask the Senator to give me his well-matured opinion—I use that expression because of the study he has given to this measure—as to the scope and meaning of the concluding clause of the bill?—

> But this act is expressly declared to be emergency legislation enacted to meet conditions growing out of war; and nothing herein is to be construed as expressing or prejudicing the future policy of the Federal Government concerning the ownership, control, or regulation of carriers or the method or basis of the capitalization thereof.

Now, just a word before the Senator answers. Does the Senator interpret that as a suggestion or legislative intimation of Government ownership or of Government capitalization of railroads? I have some views upon that point which I am not going to express now, but having entered as we have upon this universal program of governmental control, I have an apprehension that when we come out of it we will be faced with one of two alternatives, naniely, the taking over of the railroads into absolute Government ownership, or a capitalization of the railroads in order to protect the great interests involved, and in order that these great transportation facilities may be conducted with the greatest possible efficiency in the public interest. I anticipate that sort of an issue.

The question I ask the Senator, however, is whether this concluding paragraph is not a suggestion to the Congress and to the public that some such thing as that might be done, and at least that the doing of that thing is not antagonistic to the judgment of the honorable committee reporting the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I can of course only give my own view about it, and I am not quite sure that I shall be entirely accurate in my statement of the facts. The bill as presented originally provided that Government control should continue during the war and until Congress should otherwise direct. That of itself, in the judgment of some members of the committee, had a suggestion of continued future Government control, or, it may be, of Government ownership. There were in the committee, and have been ever since I have been a member of it, many men of many minds. I understood the purpose of this language was to make it perfectly clear that by the enactment of this law the Congress would not be committing itself to any one of these policies which might have been in the minds of Senators. I think that fairly states the meaning of that language, at least as I understood it.

Mr. WATSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators having answered to the roll call, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, from the financial standpoint this is the most colossal proposition ever presented to any legislative body in the history of the world.

It involves $18,000,000,000 in property.

It involves securities of an almost equivalent amount, which enter into, if indeed they do not form the basis of, the financial stability and the commercial prosperity of the Nation.

It involves taking this vast property from the hands of those who made it and those who own it and committing it to the operation and control of the Government.

It involves transferring the authority to make rates from the legislative to the executive branch of the Government.

And, if the time limit set forth in the last section be stricken out, it may prove to be the first step in the Government ownership of all the transportation facilities and all the methods of communication of the entire land.

And, therefore, we are warranted in the assertion that this measure wears features more extraordinary if not, indeed, more startling than any hitherto met with in the legislative annals of the world.

THE AMERICAN PRECEDENT.

Senators, this is not the first time in our history that the exigency of war has called forth legislation of this character. In our civil conflict it became necessary, in the judgment of the President and of Congress, to take over the railroads as a matter of military necessity, and to that end Congress in 1862 enacted the following statute:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety may require it, be, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession of any or all the telegraph lines in the United States, their offices and appurtenances; to take possession of any or all the railroad lines in the United States, their rolling stock, their offices, shops, buildings, and all their appendages and appurtenances; to prescribe rules and regulations for the holding, using, and maintaining of the aforesaid telegraph and railroad lines and to extend, repair, and complete the same in the manner most conducive to the safety and interest of the Government; to place under military control all the officers, agents, and employees belonging to the telegraph and railroad lines thus taken possession of by the President, so that they shall be considered as a post road and a part of the Military Establishment of the United States, subject to all the restrictions imposed by the rules and articles of war.
> SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That three commissioners shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to assess and determine the damages suffered or the compensation to which any railroad or telegraph company may be entitled by reason of the railroad or telegraph lines being seized and used under the authority conferred by this act, and their award shall be submitted to Congress for their action.
> SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the transportation of troops, munitions of war, equipments, military property, and stores throughout the United States shall be under the immediate control and supervision of the Secretary of War and such agents as he may appoint; and all rules, regulations, articles, usages, and laws in conflict with this provision are hereby annulled.

And I especially call your attention to the latter portion of section 5 of said act, which provides:

> That the provisions of this act, so far as it relates to the operating and using said railroads and telegraphs shall not be in force any longer than is necessary for the suppression of this rebellion.

And, sir, while we are legislating in accordance with a portion of this precedent it might be equally wise for us to follow it all.

Mr. President, a glance at section 1 of this act shows that it granted wider powers than those conferred by the pending bill; for by it the President was not only authorized to take over all the railroads of the country, but also all the telegraph lines as well; and not that alone, but to place all the property thus taken under military control and to make all the operatives of both these systems Federal employees.

It will be observed that section 3 of this act authorizes the appointment of a commission to determine the question of compensation and that their decision was to be reported to Congress for their action. However, this could have been intended only as preliminary or tentative, because the right of appeal to the court could not have been denied in that case or in this instance.

But, Senators, so fearful were the eminent men who composed that Congress of the exercise of autocratic powers by the President; so jealous were they of the rights and prerogatives of the legislative branch of the Government, and so determined were they to cling to what they regarded as the real fundamentals of our institutions that, in 1863, they passed the following resolution limiting the powers granted by the act just cited:

Resolved, etc., That an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States in certain cases to take possession of railroad and telegraph lines, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1862, shall not be so construed as to authorize the construction of any railroad, or the completion of any line of road, the greater part of which remained uncompleted at the time of the approval of said act, or to engage in any work of railroad construction. And so much of said act as authorizes the President of the United States to extend and complete any railroad is hereby repealed.

So that at all events we have a conspicuous precedent in our own history for the general principle involved in this legislation.

THE PRESIDENT'S AUTHORITY.

Mr. President, all the features of this bill are of sufficient importance to demand a most diligent study on the part of every Senator, but the three distinctively important sections are the first, which defines the standard rate; the tenth, which designates the rate-making authority; and the thirteenth, which fixes a limited time on governmental control. These excited the most prolonged debate in the committee and they will doubtless arouse the greatest interest here.

The President did not take possession of the railroads under the general war powers of the Constitution, but pursuant to an act passed by Congress on the 29th day of August, 1916. Section 1 of that act provided in part that—

The President in time of war is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system, or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same to the exclusion, as far as may be necessary, of all other travel thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment—or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

Then followed this generalization—

It is idle for us to discuss whether or not he was authorized by the provisions of this act to take complete possession of all the transportation systems of the country for all purposes. In my judgment he was not so authorized. But he has otherwise construed the act; he has taken such possession, and therefore a discussion of his power to do so would at this time be wholly academic.

In his proclamation notifying the country that he had taken possession of the railroads he said:

I have exercised the powers over the transportation systems of the country which were granted me by the act of Congress of last August, because it has become imperatively necessary for me to do so.

And, as if further to show that he derived his authority from this statute, he recited in another clause of his proclamation that he took possession and assumed control through Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, as is provided in the act just quoted, thus conclusively showing that, in his judgment, he derived his authority to act through the law of August 29, 1916.

Construing his authority as complete, he has taken possession of the railroads; he is now operating them through the Director General; he has construed the act of Congress as sufficiently broad to clothe him with this power; and therefore any further discussion of his right to do so can throw no light on or add anything of value to the pending measure.

A FEW FUNDAMENTALS.

Before beginning a detailed discussion of section 1, I desire to cite a few elementary principles, the very announcement of which will obtain for them a ready acceptance by all:

First, the railroad properties of the United States are privately owned. It is not intended by this measure to expropriate the owners. The Government does not seek to transfer the title. All this act provides is that the President shall take possession of the railroads and control and use them for all purposes. If we were seeking the title to these properties, it would be necessary for us to pay the owners their full value; but we are taking only the possession, control, and use of the transportation systems of the country, and, therefore, all that we are seeking to do by this legislation is to furnish a method of determining a just compensation for what we take.

It will not be forgotten, of course, that under the fifth amendment to the Constitution private property can not be taken for public purposes without just compensation; and this legislation is sought in order that the whole question of compensation may be amicably determined, if possible, without litigation; and yet, if such agreement can not be reached, providing the proper tribunal to finally determine it.

Senators, we are all familiar with the principle that Congress has no power to determine the measure of just compensation. That is exclusively a judicial function and must be finally settled by the courts alone.

After the President had taken over the railroads and it became necessary to compensate the owners for the property thus wrested from their hands, two courses were open to Congress: First, to commit the whole subject to the courts, by an appropriate resolution, and permit the entire question of compensation to be determined without any further legislative action. Second, to designate some outside authority—as in this case, the President—and confer upon him power to agree with the railroads as to the measure of just compensation. Congress might confer upon him unlimited power, but this bill does not go so far; it only provides a maximum beyond which he may not go. It merely sets forth terms upon which he may trade with the railroads and upon which they may agree, so that the whole question can be settled without litigation.

If the President and any railroad agree as to the terms of just compensation for taking over its property, then the question is settled as to that road. If the President and any one road can not agree, then a tribunal is established for the determination of the question, and under the provisions of the Constitution recourse may be had to the courts as a last resort in the adjudication of the issue.

SEVERAL BASES.

Mr. President, during the progress of the hearings before our committee several suggestions were made as to a proper basis for computing just compensation. One was that the market value of all the stocks and bonds of all the railways should be taken as a basis, and that a percentage of income on this value should be allowed to the railroads.

The objection to that was twofold: First, because stocks very often do not represent the real value of the property, and, secondly, because they so frequently and so violently fluctuate in price and are so often subject to manipulation and speculation that they could not form a sound basis upon which to determine the value of the use of the property they represent.

A second basis proposed was that the actual value of each railroad property be taken and that the rate of income on this value should be fixed by this act. The all-sufficient answer to that was that the war would probably be over before we could ascertain the value of each railroad property. A commission has been working on that problem for some years and it will be at least another year before their labor can possibly be concluded. Therefore this suggestion could not be adopted.

Another proposition was that we should provide for a reasonable rate of interest on the original cost of construction plus the money actually invested that was derived from the sale of securities.

I regard this as an absolutely illogical proposition, because it is impossible of achievement. Nobody knows, and nobody ever can ascertain, the original cost of construction, and that alone renders impossible the adoption of that basis.

The plan proposed in this bill appeared to us to be the most feasible and the most practical under all the circumstances. It is not ideal, but nothing ideal should be asked at this time. The railroads have been taken over, compensation must be made, legislation can not be long delayed, and therefore this plan was agreed upon as the best under all the circumstances to properly compensate the owners as well as to fully protect the Government.

JUST COMPENSATION.

Mr. President, this measure authorizes the President to offer each railroad as a just compensation for its possession, control, and use:

First. An annual payment equal to the average yearly income of that road for the three years ending June 30, 1915, June 30, 1916, and June 30, 1917.

Second. In addition thereto an agreed rate per cent on the cost of all improvements, approximately $130,000,000, made between June 30, 1917, the end of the fiscal year, and December 28, 1917, the date of taking over the roads.

Third. To guarantee the maintenance of the road at its present efficiency during the period of Government control.

Fourth. An agreed rate per cent on all betterments made during the operation of the road by the Government.

In addition to these stipulations other inducements to the roads to accept these terms are provided.

Section 6 authorizes the President to order additions or improvements to any road, as in his judgment they may be needed, to be paid for, if necessary, out of the revolving fund provided by this measure, and to be later accounted for in accordance with some plan to be hereafter agreed on.

Section 7 provides that any carrier may, in order to meet its financial obligations, issue such additional securities as will enable it to do so, and authorizes the President to buy such securities, if in his judgment it may be necessary. Thus we see that the President is authorized to make all needful arrangements, through agreement with the various roads, to operate and maintain and finance all the transportation systems of the country as a nationalized unit, and thus insure the greatest possible results for the purposes of war.

And so, Senators, at the very threshold of this discussion we are confronted with this question, Are the terms authorized by this bill insufficient or more than sufficient to guarantee full compensation to the roads for their possession, control, and use during the period of the war?

It should be borne in mind throughout this discussion that Congress is not seeking to adopt an inelastic rule of just compensation, but that it is only authorizing the President to trade with the roads and is establishing a maximum limit beyond which he may not go in making the trade. Is the rule herein provided unfair? Is it unjust either to the Government or the stockholders?

The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], as well versed on this question as any man in the Republic, has argued with great force that the President will, as a matter of course, pay the railroads the amount of the standard return herein provided, and has argued that some of these returns are unjustifiable. Mr. President, all we can do is to look to the language of the bill to determine the authority of the President in this connection. It expressly provides that the President is authorized to guarantee as just compensation to any carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission an amount "not exceeding an annual sum" payable each year.

Whether or not the return received by any railroad is too high or too low depends upon the opinion of the man pronouncing judgment; but we have every reason to believe that, if the President shall conclude that for the past three years some of the railroads have been paying out to their stockholders unwarranted dividends, and that therefore the amount they would receive under the provisions of this bill would also be unwarranted, he could deal with that railroad in accordance with the facts and provide for a return that, in his judgment, would be justifiable. In other words, the President is not compelled by the terms of this bill to pay the maximum herein provided, but it is a matter of discretion with him as to how far he shall go, within the limits herein established, in making an agreement with each railroad. We have no right to prejudge his decision by declaring in advance that it will be otherwise than as just as can be made under the existing conditions.

Is the rule herein provided unfair? Is it unjust to either the Government or the stockholders?

It may somewhat illuminate the subject to remember that in 1914 the Government of England took over the operation of their transportation systems, and, in fixing a measure of just compensation, they guaranteed to the railroads an equivalent for the net operating income for the year 1913, with certain modifications, that having been the most prosperous one in the history of those systems in that country.

The Government there, as would the Government here under this authorization, took all the revenue above the standard return, and so satisfactorily has the plan operated that the Government will no longer publish the returns received from this source.

Under the ruling of our Interstate Commerce Commission class 1 includes all the railroads of this country whose annual operating income exceeds a million dollars. The average property investment on all the railroads of that class in the United States for the three years ending June 30, 1917, totaled $16,873,832,797. Their average net railway operating income for the three years amounted to $896,259,264, or 5.31 per cent on the property investment.

The aggregate property investment of all the railroads of all classes on the 31st day of last December amounted to approximately $18,000,000,000, and the average income of all these roads for the three years ending June 30, 1917, was substantially nine hundred and forty millions, or about 5.25 per cent. This sum is the maximum amount that may be paid to all the railroads that are to be retained in accordance with the proclamation of the President, and may largely be reduced by agreement.

For it has not yet been definitely determined what roads will and what roads will not be operated by the Government, and, under section 13 of this bill, the President has until the 1st day of July, 1918, to determine that question; but whatever they may be, this measure if enacted into law practically guarantees as a maximum the average dividend declared by such roads as are taken over as were paid for the last three years, and therefore this average return for all of the railroads of practically 5.30 per cent on the investment certainly can not be held to be extravagant; and, as herein provided, other arrangements can be made by the President and any railroad that paid no dividends in the period covered by the standard return, and a less sum may be paid to any road that has been distributing extravagant dividends.

ANOTHER STATEMENT.

The 38 railway systems of the eastern district are of tremendous importance to the country. They comprise something more than a fourth of the mileage and do a much larger proportion of the business. Here the great congestion early occurred and has ever since continued, and here the great burden of the country's transportation falls.

I shall not weary the Senate with a recital of figures, but shall content myself with a few generalizations that I believe will explain the situation quite as fully as an imposing array of statistics.

Taking the annual income of these roads for the last 15 years and comparing that income with the average rate authorized by this measure, it will be found that with most of these roads and for most of the years in that period the average return exceeded the average provided by this bill. I will give but a few instances to emphasize this statement:

The average annual return for the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western was greater for 9 of the last 15 years than the average return authorized by this law.

For the Detroit & Mackinaw it was greater for 12 years, for the Hocking Valley it was greater for 9 years, for the Lehigh Valley it was greater for 13 years, for the Maine Central it was greater for 5 years, for the New York Central it was greater for 2 years, for the Pennsylvania it was greater for 10 years, for the Pere Marquette it was greater for 4 years, for the Reading it was greater for 4 years, for the Wabash it was greater for 5 years, for the Toledo, St. Louis & Western it was greater for 10 years, for the Wheeling & Lake Erie it was greater for 7 years.

So that, so far as the average per cent authorized by this bill is concerned, certainly no one can claim that it is at all unreasonable.

ANOTHER WAY OF STATING IT.

The average per cent of net operating income on the property investment of these 38 roads for the three-year period ending June 30, 1902, was 5.37; for the three-year period ending June 30, 1905, was 5.51; for the three-year period ending June 30, 1908, was 5.70; for the three-year period ending June 30, 1911, was 5.47; for the three-year period ending June 30, 1914, was 4.68; for the three-year period ending June 30, 1917, was 5.31; and thus it will be seen that the average return for the three-year period ending June 30, 1917, the period of the standard return provided in this bill, was less than the average return for any other three-year period, save one, in the last 18 years. Viewed from this standpoint the rate herein proposed can not be fairly criticized as being extreme.

The average annual return on all the railroads of the United States was greater for 1902, 1903, 1905, 1906, 1907, 1910, 1916, and 1917 than the average for the three years under the provisions of this bill, and therefore it can not be fairly claimed that the per cent of returns authorized by this proposed legislation is unreasonable, or that it is unjust to either the railroads or the Government.

SOME COMPARISONS.

Compared with returns upon investments in other fields of industry, the one here contemplated is even meager, made so because railroads are subject to governmental regulations, while the others are not.

It is generally known that it takes $5 of railroad investment to produce $1 of earnings. Bituminous coal mining produces $2 gross revenue for every dollar of capital invested; anthracite mining, 60 cents; packing-house products, $3.39; milling, $2.48; oil refining, $1.30; cotton manufacturing, 56 cents; wool manufacturing, 98 cents; automobile manufacturing, $1.32; glass furnaces, 80 cents; rolling mills, 37 cents; canning and preserving, $1.33; the railroads, 20 cents; and thus it will be seen that, as compared with the earning capacity of capital in other investments, the provisions of this bill can not be said to provide for an exhorbitant guarantee to railroad investors.

VALUE OF USE.

It was argued with great force before the Committee on Interstate Commerce that the value of the use of what the Government took over is what the compensation should be, a proposition that, from the legal standpoint, is sustained by all the courts, and that is what the committee has attempted to approximate in its authorization to the President to trade with the roads.

But the argument was carried still further, the contention being that the value of the use of the property at the very time it was taken over is the real measure of its value, and that this sum, once ascertained, should be reflected in this bill.

I do not agree with this contention. It is quite true that it would be unfair to take the value of the use in 1915 as the measure of compensation for the roads taken over in 1917, for an expenditure of $2,000,000,000 was made on the roads between June 30, 1915, and June 30, 1917; but it is equally unfair to ask that the value of the use at the very time of the taking over should be the determining factor in fixing just compensation for the reason that unusual conditions caused an immense increase in the traffic of the country just at and before that particular time.

If one were seeking to buy the establishment of Woodward & Lothrop or Parker & Bridget he would not be content to take the value of the trade the last two weeks before Christmas in order to ascertain the financial returns of the institution, for common knowledge would teach him that there is a great volume of trade at just that particular time. He would be compelled, in order to ascertain the real value of either store, to take the receipts for a series of months, or even years, before he could arrive at a just conclusion as to the real value of the property.

The same is true of the railroads. It is manifestly not unfair to take the traffic and the profits and the financial status of these carriers for a three-year period in order to ascertain the value of the use taken by the Government, for in this adjustment of the standard return the amount of money appropriated since 1915 is thus accounted for and its revenue-producing ability is not lost sight of. This method of determining the standard return seems to me to be entirely justified on every reasonable hypothesis.

ADDITIONAL GUARANTY.

I am well aware of the fact, Mr. President, that in addition to the return per cent above set forth, the President is authorized to guarantee the upkeep of each railroad taken over and to maintain its equipment at its present standard of efficiency. To do this he is authorized to use part of the revolving fund herein established, or he may use the surplus earnings of the roads over and above the standard return, which, under the provisions of this bill, go into the Treasury.

Senators, this may seem as if we were seeking to deal with the railroads in most generous fashion, and yet, when carefully analyzed, the compensation is by no means extravagant. It must not be forgotten that the average annual rate of 5.31 per cent guaranteed the railroads by this bill is net return, with only taxes to be deducted. Assuredly if the Government takes over the roads and allows them but 5.31 per cent, the average return on investment for three years, and then requires them to maintain their own properties at their maximum efficiency out of those earnings, certainly no one will assert that that is a fair rate.

Assuredly the roads should be permitted to at least preserve their present financial status while being operated by the Government, and it is certainly most desirable that investors in railroad securities should not be placed in a worse position now than they were under private management.

Senators, I make bold to say that, even though the amount guaranteed by this bill were extravagant, yet it is far better for us to deal generously with these properties than it is to plunge the entire transportation system of the United States into litigation that will inevitably last throughout many months.

Senators, the President has taken over these properties; he has dispossessed the owners; they no longer have the right to operate their own roads; they are debarred from the privilege of reaping the reward of their own industry and frugality; they can no longer draw dividends on their own investment, save as it is guaranteed by the Government. These people who, through a series of years, have invested their savings in railroad shares, now that the use and possession of their property have been forced from them, are entitled to a fair compensation, and especially in view of the fact that the returns for many years have been rendered legal by the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The railroads have not made the rates; the railroads have not fixed the returns on invested capital; that has been the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the deputy of Congress for that purpose, and therefore the returns through all these years have been legalized by an agency of the Government.

Shall it be said, therefore, that a comparison with those rates is an unfair one? Shall it not rather be assumed that past rates are just and reasonable and that the present law should authorize at least as great a return as those heretofore permitted, yea, enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Undoubtedly there will be something of inequality in the results obtained under the operation of this bill. Undoubtedly some railroads will be paid more and some may be paid less than they are fairly entitled to receive. If we were working out an equitable scheme for all the future and had abundance of time in which to complete the task, we should undoubtedly be able to device more impartial plans and arrive at juster conclusions.

But it must constantly be borne in mind that this is a war measure, that it is hasty legislation, that it is forced upon us by extreme conditions, and that the ideal under such circumstances is impossible of accomplishment.

WHAT IS REALLY PAID.

As above stated, the net average railway operating income herein provided for class 1 roads amounts to $896,259,264. Adding the average net operating income for classes 2 and 3 the maximum guaranty which the President is authorized to make all the railroads of the United States under the provisions of this act is $935,000,000, and this is approximately $100,000,000 below their income in 1917.

The President is authorized, in addition to the above, to agree with the railroads upon a rate per cent on all investments made between June 30, 1917, the end of the fiscal year, and December 31, 1917, the time of taking over the railroads. That sum is approximately $130,000,000. If the President and the roads should agree upon a 5 per cent basis, that would amount to $6,500,000. Adding that to the $935,000,000 above set forth and the maximum sum on which the President and the railroads can agree, under the provisions of this bill, is thus seen to be $941,500,000.

But, Mr. President, it must not be forgotten that out of this sum the railroads pay their excess-profits tax, which Commissioner Anderson testified to our committee would be between $50,000,000 and $90,000,000. This bill provides that that sum should be deducted from the payment made to the railroads, because the stockholders in the railroads must pay their excess-profits tax the same as those in any other line of business.

From that sum must also be deducted the interest on the bonds, which amounted last year to approximately $450,000,000.

Mr. President, in 1912 the railroads paid approximately $339,000,000 in dividends; in 1914, $376,000,000; in 1915, $259,000,000; in 1916, $281,000,000; and in 1917, approximately $300,000,000.

It is quite true that gross incomes for 1916 and 1917 were much higher than for previous years, but because of the vastly increased expenses of operation, including cost of equipment and higher wages, the net income was but slightly greater than for previous years.

It is worthy of remark also, to which attention has been called by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], that the purchasing power of a dollar at this time is not over 60 per cent as great as it was in 1914, and this should be taken into account in estimating the surplus.

And, Mr. President, it will not be forgotten by those who are taking an interest in this legislation that the stockholders will receive not more than their average dividend for the last three years, and that all surplus over and above such average dividend is to be either put back in the road, returning the dividend in the form of betterments, or else turned into the Treasury to become public money.

NECESSARY TO AVOID LITIGATION.

Senators, the railroads are not compelled to accept any terms ordered by the President. They have their rights. They are protected by the Constitution and the law of the country. This property is theirs, and they can not be dispossessed without just compensation; and, therefore, it is better for us, under existing circumstances, to deal generously with these roads than to have $18,000,000,000 of securities plunged into litigation, with all that that means to the finances of the country at the present crucial time.

We know that the Secretary of the Treasury contemplates an immediate bond issue running into the billions. Will anybody contend that the Government can sell these bonds when $18,000,000,000 of securities that form the foundation of our financial stability are rendered insecure by litigation? Is it the part of wisdom to drag these vast properties into court and thus to shake the very foundations of our financial strength and our monetary stability in order to drive a hard bargain with the owners of the railroads?

For myself, I would rather pay more than they are worth than to involve them in litigation, than to suspend them in mid-air, than to unstabilize the value of these securities, than to strike fear to the hearts of all their holders, than to cast a shadow over the whole financial problem of the country at a time so perilous.

In my judgment, we can not afford to delay the immediate settlement of this problem. We should deal with a generous hand with these roads rather than have them seek the courts to adjudicate their claims.

It is the hope of the committee that the terms offered in this bill will be accepted by practically all the roads, and that the entire matter can thus be amicably disposed of in a comparatively short time and without litigation. It is either that or else drag them all into court and plunge them all into litigation, and thus tie the hands of those who are endeavoring in this extreme crisis to deal with the great financial problems that confront and complex us.

This is no time for extreme measures in the financial world. This is no time to foster doubt, to create distrust, to incite dissensions. Rather should we exert ourselves to the utmost to maintain peace here and to promote harmony in all the fields of domestic activity.

Ten billions of liberty bonds must soon be sold or we shall fail in our great task; and in order to make sure the success of this Herculean undertaking we must stabilize these railroad securities, and all others based on them, and thus sustain the confidence of all our people in the financial stability of the United States.

RATES REASONABLE.

I am not unmindful of the fact that complaint is made because some railroads have received much larger sums as earnings and have paid much heavier dividends than others, but this has resulted because of the legal necessity imposed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to make rates uniform throughout the country.

Let us suppose that there are two roads running through the same territory, and that one of them, for various reasons, secures and handles the burden of the traffic, receives the heavier returns, and pays the larger dividends. If the rate be raised in order to stimulate the earning capacity of the other road, the returns of the first road are thereby rendered all the greater and the dividends all the larger; whereas, on the other hand, if the rate be lowered in order to prevent the more successful road from distributing such large dividends, then the weaker road is still further crippled or rendered altogether useless and the successful road is left without any competition whatever. This will always be true while rates must be kept uniform and competitive.

Senators, this is the direct result of the legislation of past years compelling competition and forbidding the pooling of either traffic or earnings.

UNEQUAL REVENUE.

It is undoubtedly true that some railroads have earned and distributed greater dividends for the last few years than others, but this is no time to remedy this evil, if evil it be. This is no time to readjust the whole rate system of the country; nor should anyone seek to take advantage of the present situation to attempt to equalize earnings and adjust financial inequities. This inequality of earning capacity, of receipts and dividends, has grown up under the direct supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The whole system has been legalized, and I submit that this is no time to attempt to remedy all the evils that have been evolved out of so complex a fabric as the railroad corporations of this country.

Rather let us have the roads operated as they are, let the dividends be paid as they have been, and then at the close of the war we can by appropriate legislation cure the defects and remedy the evils that are now so apparent to us all. This is a war measure, and it is not intended to be remedial legislation.

During the progress of this discussion the dividends paid by certain roads have been recited as showing the unfairness of this legislation and the injustice done the people because of the sums that will thus be paid to these corporations.

But, sir, I submit that it can not be fairly argued that the mere volume of business transacted by each road or the aggregate dividends it pays to its investors is evidence of the unfairness of the rates on its traffic or of unjust methods in its dealings.

Fortunately, we are not left to the wide field of conjecture in the determination of this question, for the courts have decided this very point time without number and the line of authority is unbroken on this issue.

In the case of Cotting against Kansas City Stock Yards Co. (183 U. S. Courts), the Supreme Court, speaking upon this very point, quite forcefully and cogently says:

> Pursuing this thought, we add that the State's regulation of defendant's charges is not to be measured by the aggregate of his profits or determined by the volume of his business, but by the question whether any particular charge to an individual dealing with him is, considering the service rendered, an unreasonable exaction. In other words, if he has a thousand transactions a day and his charges in each are but a reasonable compensation for the benefit received by the party dealing with him, such charges do not become unreasonable because by reason of the multitude the aggregate of his profit is large. The question is not how much he makes out of his volume of business, but whether in each particular transaction the charge is an unreasonable exaction for the service rendered. He has a right to do business. He has a right to charge for each separate service that which is reasonable compensation therefor, and the legislature may not deny him such reasonable compensation and may not interfere simply because out of the multitude of his transactions the amount of his profits is large. Such was the rule of the common law even in respect to those engaged in a quasi public service independent of legislative action. In any action to recover for an excessive charge, prior to all legislative action, who ever knew of an inquiry as to the amount of the total profits of the party making the charge? Was not the inquiry always limited to the particular charge and whether that charge was an unreasonable exaction for the services rendered?

In Canada Southern Railway Co. v. International Bridge Co. (S. App. Cas., 723, 731) Lord Chancellor Selborne thus expressed the decision of the House of the Lords:

> It certainly appears to their lordships that the principle must be, when reasonableness comes in question, not what profit it may be reasonable for a company to make, but what it is reasonable to charge to the person who is charged. That is the only thing he is concerned with. They do not say that the case may not be imagined of the results to a company being so enormously disproportionate to the money laid out upon the undertaking as to make that of itself possibly some evidence that the charge is unreasonable with reference to the person against whom it is charged. But that is merely imaginery. Here we have a perfectly reasonable scale of charges in everything which is to be regarded as material to the person against whom the charge is made. One of their lordships asked counsel at the bar to point out which of these charges were unreasonable. It was not found possible to do so. In point of fact, every one of them seems to be, when examined with reference to the service rendered and the benefit to the person receiving that service, perfectly unexceptionable according to any standard of reasonableness which can be suggested. That being so, it seems to their lordships that it would be a very extraordinary thing indeed, unless the legislature had expressly said so, to hold that the persons using the bridge could claim a right to take the whole accounts of the company, to dissect their capital account, and to dissect their income account, to allow this item and disallow that, and, after manipulating the accounts in their own way, to ask a court to say that the persons who have projected such an undertaking as this, who have encountered all the original risks of executing it, who are still subject to the risks which from natural and other causes every such undertaking is subject to, and who may possibly, as in the case alluded to by the learned judge in the court below, have the whole thing swept away in a moment, are to be regarded as making unreasonable charges, not because it is otherwise than fair for the railway company using the bridge to pay those charges, but because the bridge company gets a dividend which is alleged to amount at the utmost to 15 per cent. Their lordships can hardly characterize that argument as anything less than preposterous.

And it is worthy of observation that this same principle runs through all the decisions of the courts on the point in question. And so the mere fact that some railroads have distributed larger dividends than other railroads is no reason why at this time we should seek to equalize those inequalities or to rearrange those inequities, and especially when these have been already legalized by the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

ANOTHER VIEWPOINT.

Take the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, cited by the Senator from Iowa as having distributed 26 per cent as dividends on its earnings. What does that argue? Simply that that road, either because its builders had the foresight to construct it through a better freight and passenger producing territory than its competitors, or because the country it serves has since become a more productive one for traffic, partly due doubtless to the railroad itself, or because it handles freight and passengers more swiftly and more safely, or because of the efficiency of its advertising force, or because of the intelligent activity of its business-getting organization, or because of certain economies practiced, or because of all these reasons combined, that that road has been able to make more money than its competing line and therefore has paid larger dividends to its stockholders. But it must not be forgotten that that has all been done under governmental regulation. It has all been accomplished under the direct supervision of the rate-making authority. Is that any reason why those dividends should now be denied to those investors? Does that furnish a rational basis for arguing that these people should be refused the same rate of return on their investments under this form of governmental control that they received under the last form of governmental control?

I am not unmindful of the contention that these roads are quasi-public corporations; that their very existence depends upon a franchise granted by the public; that they, to a limited degree, exercise governmental functions, as in the right of eminent domain; and that therefore they are entitled to earn nothing but a fair per cent, say, 5 or 6 on the investment made. In fact, we are now hearing the novel doctrine announced that if the Government decides to take over the title to all the railroads and enter upon a period of Government ownership it will not be necessary to pay the stockholders the value of the property in order to expropriate them, but that all they are entitled to receive is a fair rate of interest on the original cost of construction and the capital that has since been added from the sale of securities. This means that the shareholders are entitled to no portion of the earnings, and that if they have denied themselves dividends in order to put these earnings back into the property by way of betterments, nevertheless the Government is entitled to all the increased value of the property from such invested earnings and that the stockholders have no right to share with it in that increment.

I grant you, sir, that if in the future we are to operate all the railway systems of the country as one unit under governmental control, an equal return will be just and equitable, but I can not concede that as to the past, where practically the entire success of railway operation was wrought, and the whole value of the property was developed, by capable management.

Mr. President, I believe that it is a fallacious doctrine of economy that holds that all there is to any business is the capital invested and the labor employed. Rather, I believe that every successful enterprise rests upon the three elements of capital, labor, and management.

We all believe that capital is entitled to a fair return; we are all well aware of the economic truth that the wages paid labor are the surest barometer of a nation's prosperity and the best evidence of a nation's abiding welfare; but, nevertheless, management can not be left out of the calculation in accounting for the success of any enterprise.

We are all constantly pouring out our heartfelt tributes of praise to our gallant soldier boys and stand ready to support them with all the resources of this mighty land; but yet, sir, we look to the general to lay out the plan of campaign and to manage the forces we place at his disposal. We pay the general $8,000 a year and the soldier $360 not because the private is less patriotic or less essential to warfare or less deserving of our love, but because we depend so much upon management to fight battles and win victories.

Capital is always plentiful and can be had on good security at reasonable rates; labor is always abundant and can be had at fair wages; and in the vast majority of instances failure is traceable not to the lack of either of these elements, but to the absence of successful management. Is this third essential, therefore, to be denied all participation in the profits of the concern? Even with the railroad company dependent upon a public franchise, is the successful management by which it has been built up through many years not to be taken into account in ascertaining its earning capacity?

Let us suppose two roads running through the same general territory, obtaining franchises from the same authority, having substantially the same earning capacity. The managers of one pay large dividends and apply only a small portion of the revenues to the upkeep of the property, just enough to insure its profitable operation. The managers of the other, however, pursue a different course. They pay only a fair dividend and year after year expend all the undivided profits on the roadbed, sidetracks, terminals, improved cars and engines, and, in general, take a just pride in betterments.

In the one instance the earnings have been distributed to the stockholders and have been expended for personal use; in the other, a good part of them are here, in tangible form, in the improved condition of the property. Shall there, then, be no distinction between them, if the Government is to take over their roads? To so argue is to penalize thrift and good management and economy and to place a premium on carelessness and selfishness and inefficiency.

But it is answered that this leveling of the earnings of all the roads is rendered both necessary and just because they are essentially creatures of the Government and can not even exist without a franchise.

Senators, we have a measure pending in this body now that will compel practically every business in the entire country to secure a license to do business from the Secretary of the Treasury. So that, if it become a law, permission granted under its provisions will virtually constitute a franchise, a Government license to engage in the business specified. Simply because such license or franchise is granted, will anyone say that each enterprise thus licensed shall receive the same return on its capital as every other enterprise, or that each shall realize the same dividends as every railroad is to receive under this act, or that none of them shall be entitled to receive more than 6 per cent on their investment?

I know, Mr. President, that here is the place that various schools of thought in this country step in. As to the railroad property, the members of those schools announce that capital plus management are entitled to but a small percentage of the earnings so long as private ownership is endured.

When confronted with the argument that other concerns, not dependent on the Government for a franchise, are permitted to earn much larger dividends on the capital invested, they at once assert that the Government should either license or take over all properties, so that there should be an absolute level of earnings allowed by the State in all enterprises and on all investments, as the only way in which to promote a just and lasting equality among men. This is the inevitable conclusion of their doctrine; the sure result of their theory followed to its logical finality.

Mr. President, I am as much opposed to the extreme individualist as I am to the extreme collectivist, but, nevertheless, I still insist that whenever you destroy individual initiative, whenever you take away the individual incentive to self-betterment; whenever you undermine the individual desire to accumulate and to progress, you bring the whole of the people to the dead level of a blighting and mildewing mediocrity and strike a blow at the very vitals of a republican form of government.

AUTHORITY TO MAKE RATES.

Mr. President, the next important question involved in this controversy grows out of and is based upon section 10 of the pending measure. It confers upon the President of the United States power to initiate rates, subject to revision upon complaint by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It can not be denied that rate making per se is a legislative function and does not fall within the purview of the Executive authority. I could very well wish myself that there were no exigency like that which confronts us, but the fact remains that there is and that extreme measures are always necessary in order to successfully cope with extreme conditions.

Congress has the sole right to fix rates. This power has been recognized by the courts over and over again, and there is no break in the uniformity of the decisions on this point. Personally, I should never consent to transfer this authority except upon the most exigent necessity, but I have reached the conclusion, not indeed without difficulty, that the present situation warrants this change.

This bill is a war measure. It deals with an unusual situation, and therefore confers unusual power. It bestows upon the President an authority that but very few would dream of placing in his hands in a time of peace, but it is essential that the railroads should be nationalized, that the entire transportation system of the country should be operated as a single unit, that waste should be eliminated, that congestion should be relieved, that expenses should be curtailed, that everything essential to the successful conduct of the war by this country should have just precedence, and that in order to meet the great demands now made upon us there should be a perfect coordination of the various railroad systems of the United States. This means, of necessity, that their control and operation should be placed in the hands of the executive department of Government. The Congress can not run the railroads; the judiciary can not run the railroads; and while in a time of peace the authority to make rates should remain lodged in the legislative branch of the Government, yet in order to properly and certainly finance the operations of all the railroads, under the provisions of the pending bill, it seems to me that there is no escape from the conclusion that it must be done by the executive branch of Government alone.

The President by the provisions of this act is authorized to guarantee the roads a fixed dividend, to insure the maintenance of every railway system at its present efficiency, and if necessary for the good of the service to finance improvements, betterments, and additions. He is thereby rendered directly responsible for the financial outlay, and per force should be entitled to the financial income. If he is to meet these responsibilities he is entitled to the surplus earnings or those that rise above the standard level herein described. It may be necessary, therefore, to successfully carry out this vast project, for him to raise the rates, and he should be given the power to assume the initiative in this undertaking.

COMMISSION FINAL ARBITER.

Even under these conditions the right of final decision is reserved for the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is probable that the body of rates they have established will be very slightly disturbed, and certainly not at all, unless under pressure of an imperative necessity.

In this connection I desire to read a recommendation made by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, as recorded on page 78 of the 1916 report. It shows that they then regarded the body of rates so perfect that they recommended that it be permanently established by legislative enactment. They say:

All rates, fares, and charges have been open to complaint for a period of more than 10 years, within which the commission had power to fix the future maximum rates. For a period of more than six years all proposed increased rates have been subject to protest and suspension before becoming effective. Obviously there should come a time when as to the past the general level of the rates and the relationship of rates should be fixed as reasonable. We are convinced that the best interests of the entire public, of the system of governmental regulation of rates, and of the railroads will be served by the enactment of a statute which as of a specified date fixes the existing interstate rates, fares, classifications, rules, regulations, and charges as just and reasonable for the past, and which provides that after that date no change therein may be made except upon order of the commission.

And thus, Senators, unless spurred on by an imperative necessity it is not probable that the President will change the body of rates that is the result of such patient study and such deliberate thought as the present ones, based as they are upon three decades of experience and observation by trained and competent men.

And so in order to perfectly coordinate these vast systems of transportation; in order to operate them as a nationalized unit; in order to successfully cope with the financial problem presented, I can see nothing threatening to either the railroads or the Government, much less revolutionary, by the adoption of section 10 of the pending measure.

THE TIME LIMIT.

Those who insist on continuing the governmental control of the railroads herein granted for an indefinite time base their contentions on three grounds: First, that if a limit to such control be fixed Congress may not pass such legislation as will be required to return the properties to private management; second, that the Government should continue to control the railroads in the future and that the policy hereby inaugurated should be permanent; third, that this is but the first step toward Government ownership which should become the permanent policy of the country.

The all-sufficient answer to the first contention is that the 18 months herein prescribed is ample time for Congress to provide for the return of these properties to private management. What right have we to assume that the Congress that will be in existence at the close of this war will not understand their duty, or understanding it, fail to do it? We have every reason, on the contrary, to believe that Congress will meet the imperative demands of the time and enact whatever legislation and establish whatever system of control may be required for the future operation of the railroad systems of the country. To say otherwise is to assert that representative form of government is a failure and that the very democracy that is leading the world in the present fight for its fundamental principles has broken down, and that I shall not believe.

In simple truth, Senators, we can enact adequate legislation for this very purpose, and with this very end in view, before the close of this war and, in my judgment, 6 months instead of 18 would have been ample for both the Government and the railroads to prepare for a return of the possession, control, and use of these systems to their rightful owners.

GOVERNMENTAL CONTROL.

Mr. President, as to the second suggestion, I desire to say I do not believe that the railroads of this country will ever be permitted to return to the old competitive system which we have compelled them to pursue for the last 30 years. I do not believe they should be permitted to return to that system. I believe that they will be nationalized; that they will be operated as one transportation system; that they will not be compelled to compete; that they will be permitted to pool their traffic and their earnings; that useless lines will be abandoned; that all the property and all the equipment which every railroad has heretofore provided for its own operation and its own use, will be used in common by all the other railroads in the nationalized system. I believe that the Government will control and finance this unit, and that private ownership will be continued in the future as in the past. In other words, complete governmental control with private ownership of the property controlled.

I shall not at this time enter upon an extended argument of this theory, but shall take advantage of the first opportunity presented to fully express my views to the Senate on this vital question.

Suffice it in this place to say that the tremendous success achieved by the Railway War Board in the nine months of their control is a most forceful illustration of what can be done under a unified railroad system properly managed. Influenced by this example it may safely be predicted that the American people will never permit the American railroads to return to the old system of competition. I believe that it is gone forever; that the Sherman antitrust law, so far as it affects railroad combinations, will be repealed; that antipooling laws, directed at railroad operations will, in so far as they affect the transportation systems of the country, be abrogated, and a plan will be adopted which will give the Government practical control of American railroads, without the weakness and the inefficiency incident to Government ownership.

THE THOUGHT HABIT OF THE PEOPLE.

It is very strange that, when almost anything of an unusual nature occurs in the finances of this country, something that momentarily retards prosperity or interferes with the orderly procession of events, there are a vast number of people who are ready to lay the cause of it all at the doors of the railway managers of the country.

This has come to be the fixed impulse of the American people. In many of its phases that mental state is doubtless right, but in others it is unquestionably wrong, for it frequently strikes at the railroads because of the known fact that they have been guilty of so many grievous wrongs in the years gone by.

Everybody knows of the vast peculation incident to railway finance; of the manipulation of stocks by those to whose keeping they were committed by confiding investors; of secret rebates granted to favored corporations; of the tremendous evils growing out of interlocking directorates; of the sinister and underhanded methods, star-chamber processes, and dark-alley plans inaugurated and consummated by many railroad corporations in the days gone by. These crying evils naturally resulted, first, in a protest, and then in a storm of indignation, and then in restrictive legislation lasting through a series of years, resulting in the application of the Sherman antitrust law to railroad combinations; of antirebate laws; of railway-rate regulation; of widening the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; of the formation and increasing activity of State regulating bodies.

It finally became exceedingly popular to assault the railroads, and every legislature in the country had a body of reformers whose sole claim to fame was the number of bills introduced seeking to strike at the railroads or at railway management. There were, indeed, many giant evils to be dealt with, but those who wanted sensibly to reform them were outdistanced by the vocative demagogue, who simply desired to take advantage of the popular feeling against railroads for his own self-advancement.

Naturally under these conditions the pendulum swung too far in the opposite direction, and presently the railroads found themselves with ever-increasing wages, with ever-advancing prices, with constantly diminishing revenues, and yet with importunate demands of the public that they should increase their facilities and improve their equipment and handle both freight and passengers with swifter facility; and all this continued until the railroads became helpless in the presence of this unfriendly condition of the public mind. And in the meantime, be it said to the credit of the railway management of the country, they had so improved their property that—

Nowhere else were tracks and track structures capable of sustaining such heavy loads; nowhere else were there locomotives of such great tractive power or capable of so economically turning coal into train mines; nowhere else were there freight cars strong enough and large enough to concentrate a tonnage within so few trains or without such short lengths. Where, in short, railway trains moved loads far in excess of the capacity of railway trains of other countries, and, as the efficiency of the railway trackage is limited by the number of the trains that can be passed over it, this has produced the result that, per dollar of investment, American freight movement far exceeded that of all other lands. In consequence in part of this high state of mechanical development and of this remarkably efficient management the American railways, at the beginning of the present war, were performing all their service at far the lowest charges anywhere known and were being more largely utilized than those of any other nation.

RAILROAD FINANCES.

Under these conditions, pressed as they were between the upper millstone of increasing expenses and the nether one of decreasing revenues, the railroads came as early as 1912 to a place where they earned less than 6 per cent upon the value of property which they used and operated in the public service. When the investing public became aware of this situation they declined longer to buy railroad securities. They became fearful of the financial future of the railroads, because the investor would no longer invest in railroad securities.

It was announced by James J. Hill many years ago, and later reechoed by other railway managers, that a billion dollars a year would be needed for many years to come to meet all the requirements of railway construction and efficiency in this country. And yet in 1916 only $64,101,000 was obtained by the railroads and since January, 1915, only $91,535,000—this exclusive of refunding, and more could not be had.

It is well known to all that as far back as 1905 and 1906 first-mortgage bonds of the highest class sold at an average price of 103, and now those same bonds are selling at an average price of 84. It was recently heralded in the New York papers that the New York Central issued a hundred million debentures bearing 6 per cent interest, an unusual mark for securities of that grade. In 1916, when the stock of that railroad was above par, it offered to its old stockholders twenty-five millions of new stock at par, but its managers were unable to place this sum and the offer was withdrawn. To-day that stock sells at 75.

The simple truth is that all regulated investments have steadily declined in value and in dividend-earning capacity, while unregulated industries have flourished untouched by the hand of the Government, and this has naturally led all capital to seek investment in unregulated securities.

To illustrate, in 1894 there were 110 railways listed on the New York Stock Exchange; in 1904 there were 102; in 1914 there were 92; in December, 1917, but 88.

In 1894, 22 of those listed were selling at par; 38 in 1904; 22 in 1914; and but 14 in 1917, while at the same time, on the other hand, unregulated industries increased perceptibly in both respects and their securities were freely taken at desirable rates. This shows the waning confidence of the investing public in railroad securities, caused by insistent regulations, amounting at times to almost strangulation, by the perpetual hammering by all commissions to satisfy the demands of the shipping public, by vastly increased cost of operation, and by knowledge of the fact that railroads were not permitted to earn dividends that would justify the investment.

And, Mr. President, this chaotic condition of railway finances all the more certainly justifies the pending legislation and all the more clearly points the way outlined in this bill.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

But, Senators, Government control is not Government ownership, although the two are frequently confounded in the public mind; and although they are used interchangeably by many bodies in drafting resolutions, in reality they are as wide apart as the poles.

Government control means the adoption of a plan that would enable the Government to have charge of the operations and the financing of all the roads without being compelled to buy them. Government ownership would necessitate the purchase of all the property, valued at approximately eighteen and one-half billions of dollars. It would at once deprive the States of something more than a hundred and fifty millions by way of taxation. In Indiana the railroads paid, in 1917, $5,888,000 in taxes, State and local, on a valuation for taxation of $240,000,000, or approximately 11.6 per cent of the total assessed valuation on the property in the State for taxation. The elimination of this great sum would seriously cripple other forms of industries, that would be compelled to bear this increased burden of taxation under Government ownership. Proper governmental control would not involve this relinquishment.

If the Government owned the railroads they would be directly administered by the President and his Cabinet; but I am persuaded that it would be far preferable that some plan should be devised that would mean advisory control, exercised very much as England is handling its railroads to-day.

PRIVATE MANAGEMENT.

Governmental control will undoubtedly enable the railroads of the country to handle all the traffic in any time of peace and practically all of it in this time of war. It is not necessary that a policy of Government ownership should be adopted in order to secure this desired end. This is conclusively proved by the results of private management since the formation of the Railway War Board, on the 11th of April, 1917, six days after we plunged into this struggle.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator if I understand him to be in favor of Government control even in time of peace?

Mr. WATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. The same as we are now assuming it in time of war?

Mr. WATSON. No; I would not say the same; but, as I said just a moment ago, I do not care to enter at this time upon a full discussion of the plan that I have in my own mind, and even that has not been worked out to its final detail——

Mr. BORAH. I did not desire to interrupt the Senator, but the statement was rather interesting.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know whether or not the Senator honored me with his presence a few moments ago when I went over that at some length, not in detail but as a generalization.

What was the situation that confronted these five gentlemen who composed that board at the time of our declaration of war?

THE COAL SITUATION.

It will be remembered that in June, 1917, Secretary Lane called a number of gentlemen together to a conference in Washington for the purpose of consulting with Mr. Peabody, who had charge of that department of the Council of National Defense that had to do with the production and distribution of coal. They agreed on a price of $3 a ton at the mine. Immediately thereafter Secretary Baker announced that that sum was too high, and that he would not consent to pay it for Army purposes. Secretary Daniels subsequently made the same announcement with reference to the Navy. Shortly thereafter Dr. Garfield was made Fuel Administrator, and he also announced that that price was too high and advised the people of the country to wait for cheaper coal. I am not saying this for the purpose of animadverting upon the conduct of these gentlemen, but I am only arguing as to what produced the great congestion under which the country suffered during the last year. This produced two results, both of which were unsatisfactory: First, private consumers did not buy, and winter came on and found their bins empty. As the cold weather approached and they found that prices were not to be reduced, there began a wild scramble for coal which resulted in the railroads attempting to meet the transportation demands and largely aided in bringing on the worst congestion in railroad traffic ever known in this country.

Second, it resulted in many large concerns, which were not hopeful of lower prices, buying in large quantities and thus preparing for the future, so that in reality the coal problem was not so much one of transportation as of distribution.

Take, for instance, the domestic sizes of anthracite. There is really no excuse for an increase in the consumption of that product, except the ordinary growth of population; and yet it is known that very many communities received fully a third more than ever before. This meant that the railroads hauled the coal, but that certain persons bought and stored it and there was not a general distribution.

About this time a very great number of vessels engaged in coastwise trade were commandeered by the Government for trans-Atlantic uses, and a number of others, whose owners were attracted by the hope of great profits, also entered the cross-ocean service. This threw a greatly increased tonnage on the railroads for immediate transportation. Seventy-five per cent of the population of New England is located within 50 miles of tidewater and, very naturally, the heaviest movements of coal from the West Virginia field ought to be, and under ordinary conditions is, by water. Yet, notwithstanding the increased demand for coal at Boston, the railroads were compelled to carry a very greatly increased quantity, because of the diversion of vessel tonnage from this service.

It was stated before our committee that one railway in 1916 had carried a million tons more than in 1915, while the tonnage carried by water was 650,000 tons less than in the previous year.

In addition to that, the Interstate Commerce Commission required all railroads touching on the Great Lakes to dispense with the boats which they had operated to and from the ports they reached, and this greatly reduced the available tonnage for the movement of coal on the Great Lakes, and thus added to the burden of the railroads; and so the unfortunate coal situation increased tremendously the congestion that occurred in the fall of 1917 and that has continued throughout the winter months.

ANOTHER CAUSE.

From September, 1914, to August, 1915, practically 2,000,000 tons of freight were handled by the Atlantic and Pacific ports through the Panama Canal. When the war broke out the attractive rates on steamships for trans-Atlantic trade induced these carriers to drop the canal route and enter the cross-ocean business; and in this way 2,000,000 tons of freight were thrown on the already overburdened railways. To handle this amount requires every day 46,000 cars and 619 locomotives, and this further added to the congested condition of the railroads.

PRIORITY ORDERS.

One of the most potent influences in producing this congestion was the indiscriminate use of the preference envelope by shipping agents of the various departments. Under the direction of the Quartermaster General's Department the railroads printed what they were pleased to call a blue envelope, and freight on any bill of lading inclosed in one of these envelopes and marked "United States Government service" was given preference.

Mr. Kruttschnitt, president of the Union Pacific, thus portrays the results:

> Now, the Army, because of the vast tonnage it was shipping and the great number of officers charged with disposing of its freight, used those envelopes for a great deal of freight that really did not require preference movement.

In other words, it was used for everything the Government bought and a very large quantity that it had not. Say, for instance, that a manufacturer was turning out 10,000 tons of freight, 1,000 tons of which was for governmental uses. Now, not only that 1,000 tons obtained preference, but preference envelopes were also used by the manufacturer for the other 9,000 tons as well. This practice continued until on the Pennsylvania Railroad in the Pittsburgh region fully 85 per cent of the entire tonnage was shipped under Government preference.

Every article consigned to any officer of the United States, all the war material ordered by our allies on their own account, all raw material and supplies of every character for the manufactured product intended for any of the entente Governments, together with all shipments of troops, of whom more than 2,000,000 were transported within a few months, were supposed to be moved, at least required to be moved, on priority orders.

Because of the anxiety of the American Government to meet the exigent demands of the occasion and our great haste to aid our allies, we rushed thousands of carloads to the seaboard cities, particularly New York, Boston, and Newport News, that could not be properly cared for There was an utterly inadequate number of ships to carry so great a tonnage across the ocean; there was no storage capacity equal to caring for such shipments, and, therefore, thousands of cars were left upon the sidetracks and were used as warehouses for storage purposes. But a short time ago one country alone had supplies stored at different seaports along the Atlantic in excess of its ability to carry over the ocean for the next seven months. It was stated before our committee that the total freight now awaiting transportation at all these ports amounted to 2,000,000 tons. It is thus apparent that all these supplies were rushed to the seaboard in advance of necessity; that thousands of cars were used as warehouses to store this tonnage until such time as it could be transported, and that thereby the transportation system of the country was most injuriously affected.

Of course, it is quite manifest that where everything is preferred nothing is preferred, and yet the endless congestion resulting from this system, together with the direct orders from the priority board, could not fail to bring about just such a bewildering condition as the one that has retarded industry and produced much suffering throughout the country during the last few months.

ANOTHER PLAN.

Mr. President, if I had been formulating this bill I would have provided for the appointment of a board of five to have charge of the railroads under Government control, hoping that the President would have been induced to appoint the five really strong and capable men who composed the railway war board that took charge of the railroads under the most unfavorable conditions conceivable and wrought the most marvelous results. Immediately after our declaration of war this board was selected by an appropriate resolution passed by the railroad presidents of the country, and, to use the language of Mr. Fairfax Harrison, chairman of the board—

Following the adoption of this resolution 631 railroads, comprising 262,000 miles of line in the United States, immediately coordinated their activities, and for eight months have been operated as a unified continental system.

I challenge the world to show equal results under anything like similar circumstances.

He further says:

Quoting the chairman of our central department: "By this act this great railway system with all its facilities was made to serve the Government in this crisis as completely as if it had owned them, and at the same time the Government was spared the expense of buying the roads and the responsibility and labor of managing them."

And in not one single instance was a request that they made refused or an order that they issued disobeyed.

And it is most significant that this organization was purely voluntary and was not required by any legislative enactment.

By increasing the tonnage pulled by every locomotive; by a system of intensive loading by means of which the amount put in each car was increased 5 per cent; by means of the increase of train miles made by each locomotive and by each car each day; by means of laying off excess passenger service; by means of transferring 100 engines from the southwestern district to the congested eastern district; by means of using the railroads as one system and routing freight regardless of pay to the railroad used; by means of diverting freight from New York and Boston to southern ports; by all these and other methods they increased the ton-miles per month per locomotive 1,094,800, or 16 per cent, and also augmented the ton-miles per freight car 14,670, or 14.2 per cent over the preceding year. In reality, this added 4,897 locomotives and 339,497 freight cars to the equipment of the carriers.

Two thousand eight hundred and forty locomotives and 141,475 freight cars, on the average, were ordered each year between 1907 and 1916. This additional equipment, therefore, was equivalent to the immediate delivery, without cost, of one year and nine months' locomotive orders and two years and four months' car orders.

Mr. President, it is worthy of comment that all this was done in the face of the fact that railroads could get no more money for additional equipment; that although they had large orders for locomotives and cars, they could get none of them made because of the demands of the Government on all steel mills; that locomotives and cars already built were commandeered by the Government and sent to Russia and France; and that they were compelled to, and were enabled to, bring about this tremendous increase in traffic solely by the management of the railways as a unified system.

FURTHER RESULTS OF PRIVATE MANAGEMENT.

For the calendar year 1915, the roads of classes 1 and 2 carried 309,965,120,264 revenue ton-miles; in 1916, 365,760,988,679; and in 1917, the vast total of 409,403,341,005. In the same time the same roads made 33,298,921,845 passenger miles in 1915, 35,186,307,900 in 1916, and over 36,000,000,000 in 1917.

To visualize it in another way and use the language of Mr. Kruttschnitt:

Now, if we estimate the ton mileage for the entire year from the ton mileage for the half year by doubling it, we would have the astounding total of 409,000,000,000, which is an increase of 135,000,000,000 over 1915. These figures really convey nothing to the mind unless we get some way to picture them. We can form this picture thus:—According to the last available statistics of the railroads of Canada, Germany, Great Britain, Russia, France, and Austria, excluding Hungary, those nations having populations of 323,000,000 souls and 178,000 miles of railroads, the entire freight traffic handled by the roads of all those countries only equals the increase of the traffic handled by United States roads in 1917 over 1915.

And that increase alone amounted to more than the entire tonnage handled by the railroads in 1906.

Mr. President, is anyone so bold as to state in the presence of these stupendous statistics that it is necessary to have Government ownership of the railroads of this country in order to handle the peace traffic of the Nation? Mr. Kruttschnitt does not think so, for he specifically stated that if the railroads could have the same kind of cooperation in peace that they have in war there would be no trouble in managing the peace traffic of the United States, even though the tonnage were largely increased.

Mr. Hall, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee, in answer to the question, "Wherein did the railroad managers fail to bring about perfect coordination?" answered:

I have not suggested that they did fail.

He further said, and his testimony is exceedingly valuable on the point at issue:

The carriers by rail in this country have been called upon to take care of the traffic that they have been accustomed to have, plus the traffic that no longer moves in part or in whole by water, plus the demands from across the sea growing out of the war, plus the later demands incident to our great expenditures in preparation for doing our part on that side, and plus also the movement of something like 2,000,000 of men to various cantonments, plus the transportation of all material that went into the construction of those cantonments and of entire supplies for those cantonments. They have had to respond to the activity of the Shipping Board, and to do so many, many other things that any attempt to enumerate them would be vain. But it is a perfectly tremendous increase in traffic moving very largely along certain of these main-line routes that was met in part by a campaign for increased loading which has yielded very remarkable results, and for prompt loading and unloading, which has also yielded very remarkable results; and I think it is safe to say that there has been a greater degree of cooperation between shippers and carriers since we got into this war than at any time in the history of railroad operation in this country.

Who is there to say, in the presence of these facts, that it is essential for the Government to own the railroads, with all that that means to our institutions, in order to take care of the traffic of the country?

It is worthy of remark, Mr. President, that Commissioner McChord, in his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee, was not willing to say that the railroads had failed even under the stress of war. In that connection he simply said:

I do not concede that the carriers could not have relieved the situation.

Further on in his testimony this question was asked:

In other words, your opinion is that if they had nationalized the roads, as they might have done, they themselves under their management could have directed and managed the roads so that they could have handled the traffic?

And to this he answered:

I think so.

It is perfectly manifest that Government ownership is by no means essential to moving the peace traffic of the country, when in reality the war traffic could, in all human probability, have been successfully handled by private management under private ownership had a little more time been given in which to do it. When private management can so handle the railroads as a coordinated unit as to increase the traffic 20 per cent over what it was in 1916 and 50 per cent over what it was in 1915, is there any reason to doubt that it could successfully handle the peace traffic of the country?

Mr. President, I in nowise disparage the efforts of Mr. McAdoo when I say that he has not handled the railroads any more wisely or any more effectively than the Railway War Board. If it be said that in the six weeks of management under his control the weather has been exceedingly bad, it must be stated by way of offset that the weather was also very severe for some time before he took control, as the testimony before the committee conclusively shows.

Mr. George N. Shriver, vice president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway Co., testifying on that point before our committee, in answer to a question as to whether or not traffic conditions were improved at the time of his testimony over what they had been before, said:

I doubt very much if they are improving, because we have had a spell of the most severe winter that we have ever experienced, so far as I know, in this whole eastern territory, particularly along the line of the Ohio River. Places where ordinarily you will get no lower temperature than, say, 20° above, for a week past and for a great deal of the period since December 1, have been showing 4°, 5°, and down to 12° below zero. For instance, at points like Cincinnati and Dayton, where they ordinarily are not prepared for severe winter weather, engines froze up in the roundhouse; and there has been a great deal of that. Now, when those engines freeze up it takes longer to get them shaped up again for service. If I may put it in this way, ordinarily we may have five days of very severe winter weather that suspends things for a few days, but these difficulties can be overcome in another week. This winter we have had 30 or 40 days of continuous severe weather, and it will take time to overcome the effects, because we can not make repairs as quickly as we could before, and the number of engines out of service is greater.

This statement was made on the 9th of January, as shown by the hearings. So it can not be said that Mr. McAdoo's management of the railroads has failed because of the weather, any more than it can be charged that the management of the Railway War Board failed because of the weather. It is perfectly obvious that when the tremendous demand for coal is lessened far less of that product will be carried, and all other products will have a larger opportunity for transportation.

Mr. McAdoo will probably accomplish results, because he is largely operating through the gentlemen who so successfully managed the railroads and because he has formulated no new policy and adopted no new scheme, but has contented himself with following out the suggestions heretofore made by them, and which they would have followed out had they been left in control. I regard this as very wise on his part, for he definitely stated before our committee that he had no great knowledge of railroad management.

I cite these facts and make this argument not because I am in favor of returning to the old system of private management, but to show that Government ownership is not necessary in order to take care of the railway traffic of the country.

My objection to returning wholly to private management is that in the time of peace the railroads might not be operated as they were under the Railway War Board; that the old competitive methods might be readopted; and that all the old systems, with all of their evils, might again be foisted upon the public. Therefore I favor such public control as will preserve the good and prevent the evil of private management and at the same time avoid the dangers and pitfalls of Government ownership.

No wonder that the Railway War Board won the unstinted praise of the President, of the Secretary of War, of the Quartermaster General, and of all others familiar with their great work. They accomplished their prodigious task amidst unparalleled difficulties, and they consummated their great work voluntarily, undriven by law and uncompelled by statute, actuated solely by motives of patriotism.

Even under these extreme conditions that management brought the railroads to that high degree of proficiency that they handled this vast amount of freight and these great numbers of passengers at less expense than they ever had been handled by any other railroad system on earth. The average gross earnings per ton-mile of freight in the United Kingdom was 2¼ cents; and, using that as the basic figure of 100 for comparative purposes, in Germany it was 1.37 cents, or 60 per cent of that of the United Kingdom; in France it was 1.03 cents, or 57 per cent of that of the United Kingdom; in Switzerland it was 2½ cents, or 111 per cent of the British rate; and in the United States it was 0.71 cents, or only 31 per cent of the British rate; and it ought not to be forgotten that all this was brought to pass by private management of privately owned railroads.

WHAT GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP MEANS.

Senators, the Government ownership of railroads will undoubtedly be immediately followed by the Government ownership of the telegraph and telephone systems and express companies. We have already gone to great lengths in experiments with Government ownership. We have a Government-owned railroad in Alaska; we have a Government-owned nitrate plant; we have a Government-owned armor-plate plant; we are erecting two Government-owned munition plants, in my judgment, without any authority of law; we have a Government-owned merchant marine; and we are so far committed to that policy that it is time for us to pause long enough to see whither we are drifting as a Nation.

I believe that Government ownership of all methods of transportation and all means of communication, adding 4,000,000 of people to the pay roll and converting them into Federal employees, would ultimately result in the destruction of our form of Government. Undoubtedly it means a letting down in efficiency, it means a lowering of all the standards of effectual workmanship, and it means a vastly increased outlay of money for a vastly inferior service. Everyone who is familiar with the operations of the governmental departments knows that to be true.

FIRST STEPS IN SOCIALISM.

Government ownership is not in itself the adoption of socialism, but it is the first step in the socialistic program. Mr. Morris Hillquit, late candidate for mayor of New York on the Socialistic ticket and one of the foremost leaders of this cult, as one of its most voluminous writers, and who therefore speaks with authority, in his work Socialism Summed Up, page 25, thus sets forth the definite aims of the Socialist propaganda:

Stated in more concrete terms, the Socialist program requires the public or collective ownership and operation of the principal instruments and agencies for the production and distribution of wealth—the lands, the mines, railroads, steamboats, telegraph and telephone lines, mills, foundries, and modern machinery. This is the main program and the ultimate aim of the whole Socialist movement and the political creed of all Socialists of every school. It is the unfailing test of Socialist adherence and admits of no limitation, extension, or variation. Whoever accepts this program is a Socialist, whoever does not is not.

Individual Socialists may differ in their individual socialist conceptions. They may come to the Socialist ideals by various routes, they may disagree on every question of method, but they are all in accord on the main subject of the movement. The common complaint about the numerous varieties of socialism springs from a superficial knowledge of the Socialist philosophy. As a matter of fact, no political party has ever advanced as definite, consistent, and uniform doctrines as those of international socialism.

Sir, this is in direct line with the announcement of the final purpose of socialism by all the Socialists of the world from Karl Marx and Frederick Engel, who collaborated and produced what is known as the Communist Manifesto, which is the Bible of Socialism, the two stars of the socialistic firmament down to this hour.

I am opposed to indefinite extension of Government control, because it opens up the way for, if indeed it is not intended by many as the first step toward, Government ownership. Certainly it is in complete harmony with the purpose of all Socialists, national and international, the force that is asserting itself so tremendously in all nations at this time.

Public ownership means other millions working for the Government; it means the extension of civil service over this vast number of citizens; it means that the civil-service system, regardless of its merits in the past and of the high purpose of those who conceived and those who have since enforced it, is quite likely to fail because of the power it will be required to exercise; it means the inescapable temptation to use this force as a political machine, to raise the wages of all employees before election, and to use all the other means of control and methods of subordination known to the American people, and sometimes used by politicians in the stress of a campaign.

I do not believe that we, as a Nation, can stand that strain. I do not believe we should place such dangerous power in the hands of any man. I do not believe that we should confer such extreme authority over such a vast number of American citizens upon any individual. It is contrary to the very purpose of our theory of government.

If we take the first step along this socialist highway, who so wise as to prophesy what the last may be? Aye, who so bold as to deny what the next will be? Unquestionably, Mr. President, we are face to face with the settlement of this stupendous problem, and we should not commit ourselves even to the first of its doctrines without preparing to accept them all or to fight them all, for, if we inaugurate this program, in the end it will all be forced upon the country and, in my judgment, forced upon it to the destruction of our form of Government.

Mr. President, if we have in this country Government ownership of railroads, telegraphs, telephones, and express companies, immediately the demand will come to take over the mines; in fact, we are told that the administration is even now preparing to take charge of the mines and of the oil fields. This may now be, or may hereafter become, necessary as a war measure; but, sir, if the control of all these public utilities shall continue in the time of peace, as it is now proposed that the authority invested by this bill shall, there is the gravest danger that any President, backed by the power his position naturally gives him over the press and over the people, and backed by all the tremendous agencies he can use for the formation of public opinion and the vast influences he can bring to bear for the creation of public sentiment, might make himself the Chief Executive of this country so long as he chooses to do so, and that would ultimately mean the overthrow of the form of Government created by the fathers and preserved to us by the countless sacrifices of succeeding generations. Therefore, I am opposed to the first step of that program.

Senators, there is a lion at the door. Shall we open it wide and run the risk of restraining his savage fury after he is in, or shall we not rather close the door and keep him on the outside and make sure that we shall be saved from his power?

I am decidedly in favor of the time limit imposed in this bill. There is no occasion for further extending it. The Congress in existence at the close of this war will meet the exigencies of the occasion. The American people will demand that this question be dealt with wisely and patriotically and bravely, and the American Congress will heed that demand.

I early offered an amendment providing for a six months' limitation on governmental control after the proclamation of peace. The committee has seen fit to extend the limit and, while I very much prefer the shorter period, yet I am content to see the latter imposed. I am unalterably opposed to having these vast powers conferred for a longer period than the occasion which requires their creation.

All the other authority conferred upon the President is for the period of the war. This, too, is a war measure. There is no possible justification for it on any other theory. The President's proclamation recites that this step is taken because of the compulsion of war; he sets forth specifically that he took this action under the statute of August 29, 1916, which is nothing but a war enactment and wholly for war purposes; this very bill recites that this legislation is rendered necessary as a war proposition.

Why, then, should not the powers it bestows cease at a specified time after the war? On what theory can it be definitely extended? Who is willing to contend that it is necessary, in order to win this war, to permit Mr. McAdoo or any other man to control the railroads long after the war shall have ceased? Mr. President, this limitless control smacks too much of personal politics to secure my vote.

STILL GREATER AUTHORITY.

Senators, the Overman bill now pending before this body confers upon the President unheard-of powers, many of which to my mind are entirely unjustifiable, but the most reprehensible feature of that measure, in my judgment, is the one that provides that this autocratic authority shall continue for one year after the termination of the war. Why this provision? Why seek in that measure, as in this, to perpetuate power asked to prosecute war into the days when there shall be no war? These are war powers. They are asked for war purposes. They are not constitutional, they are not in harmony with the spirit of our institutions, they are irreconcilably opposed to every theory of our Government, aye, they are un-American, on any other hypothesis. They have no place in our peace establishment and every patriot should cry out against these efforts to take advantage of the extreme necessities of war to seize unlimited authority to be used for some purpose in the days of peace.

Sir, I am willing to confer upon the President—any President—all the power necessary to win this war; I have voted for several measures the necessity of which I doubted, because he stated that the authority sought was essential to the successful prosecution of this conflict, and I shall so vote in the future when my judgment is convinced; but, sir, I am not yet convinced that in order to win this war it is necessary to confer upon the President these tremendous powers for a period of peace long after this conflict shall have ceased.

There may be slight justification for some such action in connection with the pending bill, because legislation is necessary before the roads are turned back to their owners, but no such excuse can be offered for the Overman bill. That but shows a sheer desire for war power for peace purposes, and for one I shall never vote to confer it. It is asked because of the war; it arises wholly out of the necessity of this conflict; and, if granted, it should all cease with the ending of this conflict.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that all the terms and conditions under which the railroads are to be handled during the war are settled by the legislation before we take them, and all money advanced to the railroads can be secured by the President under the arrangement for loaning the money; and therefore, unless the American people see fit to change entirely the policy of control of the railroads after the war, in times of peace, there is no necessity for any legislation to turn back the roads to their owners?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I would very largely agree with the Senator. In the main, his contention is justified by the facts. There might be some legislation required, but I do not think it is essential that we should argue that proposition at this time.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana further yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I asked Mr. McAdoo if he could name any act of the Legislature that was necessary, and he was unable to do so; and nobody yet has named it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, Mr. President, it would be impossible now to determine what legislation will be necessary then; otherwise, the Congress could enact it now. Will the Senator from Indiana yield further?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Indiana, in a previous portion of his remarks, has stated that in his opinion it will be necessary for Congress to pass some very important legislation to fix the status of the railroads in the future, when the period of Federal control is terminated. He has outlined in part a plan which is very far-reaching in its importance and consequences, and he has stated that the plan is not completely formulated in his own mind.

I think it is agreed, Mr. President, by most of the members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, that legislation of very great importance touching this subject will be necessary; and that fact is emphasized by the fact that, so far as I am informed, no Senator has advocated the immediate return of the railroads to their owners at the conclusion of the war. So far as I know, every Senator has proposed that some period should elapse following the war before that should occur. Some have said six months, others a year, others a year and a half, and some two years. So far as I know, no Senator has claimed that in all probability conditions will be such that the properties should be returned to their owners immediately following the close of the war.

I thank the Senator from Indiana for yielding to me.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, of course if the roads are to be turned back to be operated as they have been hitherto, no legislation will be required; but if it be thought desirable to change the system so that there shall be some sort of governmental control in order to unify and nationalize the various transportation systems of the country, then, perforce, there must be something of legislation. It depends altogether upon the viewpoint of the person expressing the opinion. I have very great respect for the judgment of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I know full well his views on this subject. He and I do not quite agree as to the future, and therefore there is something of disagreement between us as to the policy which will be necessary at the conclusion of the war, and yet our views are not essentially different.

But I must conclude, because the hour is growing late.

AMERICAN STABILITY.

Senators, at the beginning of this conflict I did not believe that a complete upsetting of our whole peace establishment would be necessary to enable us to do our part in this momentous conflict. I believed then that, acting as a republic, and not as an autocracy, we could utilize all our forces and mobilize all our resources, and then, in solid phalanx, in unbroken array, we could move onward, right onward, to the accomplishment of our mighty task.

But, sir, events have decreed otherwise, and circumstances have compelled the abandonment of that policy. But, now that we have chosen a different course, in order to properly array ourselves for this conflict, let us resolve that it shall be made known to the world that we have enacted all the unusual legislation passed by Congress since we were dragged into this conflict wholly for the purposes of war; that we have not, by the enactment of these laws, abandoned to the slightest degree any of the fundamental principles of our Government; but that by this course we are only seeking to emphasize those principles among our own people and to give to the other nations of the earth the shining example of a democracy in action, of a republic at war for the preservation of the sacred ideals of the Union.

And to that end let us firmly resolve that, with the proclamation of peace, the President shall surrender all the vast powers willingly conferred upon him by an aroused people, because of the exigent necessities of war; that this Nation shall return to the kind of Republic founded by the revered fathers of the Union; and that we shall reestablish, upon foundations too secure ever to be threatened, the three independent and coordinate branches of government, and thus best give to the world the example of a republic whose people can defend it in the time of war, and whose citizenship can govern it in the days of peace.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator described very forcefully—and his whole speech was one of great power—the congestion at New York and Boston. I think those were the two ports he named.

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I have been engaged, with others, in investigating the coal situation; and in that connection I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks the congestion at those two great ports has been materially relieved by closing factories in Maine and sawmills in Louisiana? [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I think the question answers itself.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill, and ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I have seen those who are interested, so far as speaking on the bill is concerned, and I should like now to have some definite time fixed at which we may get a vote on the bill. Before I ask for a unanimous-consent agreement, I want to read a communication sent me by Mr. McAdoo. He says:

> May I take the liberty of expressing the hope that the Senate may soon be able to take action upon the pending railroad bill?
> I can not overemphasize the urgent necessity for prompt action in this matter. This is the time of the year when the railroads should be placing orders for essential equipment and making preparation for those improvements in their facilities which will enable them to meet the great and urgent demands for transportation for which they now not only have insufficient motive power and equipment but in many cases inadequate facilities. It is a great task to do the required work in time to get the benefits this year. It is my earnest conviction that every day's delay in setting this work forward is imperiling the success of the war, limiting the industrial efficiency and jeopardizing the general prosperity and welfare of the country. We can not go forward with many matters of vital moment until the pending railroad bill becomes a law.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that not later than 5 o'clock on the calendar day of Thursday, February 21, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill through its regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after the hour of 3 o'clock on the calendar day of Thursday, February 21, no Senator shall speak more than 10 minutes on any amendment or on the bill itself.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator believe he ought to make that request to-morrow? It will be difficult, perhaps, to get the necessary quorum at this hour. We will have to have a call of the roll.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am aware of that fact; but I think we will serve a good purpose by securing the agreement this afternoon. I am sure there will be a quorum, because there are numbers of Senators here now, and I am sure they are perfectly willing to consent to the time limit I have proposed, because I have canvassed as carefully as I may the Senators present in order not to shut off anyone who desires to discuss the bill. That gives us three whole days, and all the Senators that I have seen are perfectly willing to have that time fixed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest another thing to the Senator. I think he ought to provide in his request that commencing at some time—I am not particular when; I would not care if it commenced to-morrow—the speeches shall be limited to a certain time, say 10 minutes, and that that shall run on for a day or so. In that way the debate will wear itself out. We have always found a great many objectionable features when we had a time fixed for voting on everything. Unnecessary time is devoted to the consideration of some amendment, and amendments will be proposed at the last hour, and nobody will have an opportunity even to explain them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, for that very reason I did not think it wise to put any restriction on the debate until an hour or two before we begin to vote on the bill with a view to its final passage, because amendments will be offered, the proponents of which will want to explain them at more length than 10 minutes would permit. Having had now several days of debate on the three essential features of the bill, I hope the Senator will let us have this unanimous-consent agreement; and then, if on Tuesday or Wednesday it should transpire that it would be to the best interests of expedition to limit the debate, by that time, during those two days, we certainly will know what amendments are to be offered, and we then can take further action with a view to limiting the debate. But I do not want at this time to limit the debate. The Senator himself has indicated his desire to make some remarks on the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I am ready to make them now. I shall be glad to make them this afternoon, Mr. President. If, however, the Senator goes ahead with his request for unanimous consent, of course that means that nothing more will be done to-day, even if we finally secure the agreement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to object to voting on the bill at 5 o'clock on Thursday; but that agreement ought to be accompanied with a provision or an understanding that the bill will be kept before the Senate all the time between now and then and that votes upon amendments may be taken at any time when no one desires to discuss them further. I am entirely unwilling to go up to 5 o'clock Thursday afternoon, and then, without any debate or a word, vote upon all the amendments which may be on the table. I have observed that that is the very best course in the world to bring about utter confusion.

There are certain amendments that are to be offered to the bill. They have been printed—some of them, at least—and I should like to have an understanding with the chairman that we shall go right along this afternoon as long as he pleases and all day to-morrow, and that when an amendment is offered to the bill and debate is no longer desired upon it then we shall have a vote upon that amendment, and that we shall not wait until Thursday afternoon to have it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is perfectly agreeable to the chairman of the committee, and I hope it will be to the Senate, because I hope that to-morrow afternoon we can begin to take up whatever amendments may be offered, consider them on their merits, and vote on them before we begin to consider any other amendment. If we could put that in the form of an agreement, I should be glad to do so; but I hardly think it could be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing to trust the chairman of the committee to carry out that policy if he understands that that is the course to be pursued and if the Senate has notice of it. They must know that there are likely to be votes upon important amendments to the bill at any time between now and 5 o'clock Thursday.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let that be understood now. Let Senators be notified that the chairman of the committee will use all of his power to put that course into operation.

Mr. ROBINSON. The right ought to be reserved to lay the bill aside temporarily, by unanimous consent, in the case of some emergent matter. I suppose the Senator from Iowa would not object to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I do not want to tie it up so that it could not be laid aside on any account.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But I should like to say, Mr. President, that it is the intention of the chairman of the committee to keep this bill constantly before the Senate until the time of its final disposition. I want to have the Senate recess from time to time, so that no other business will intervene except such matters, as those stated by the Senator from Arkansas, that may be of such necessity that we would have to temporarily lay aside this measure to dispose of them.

Now, Mr. President, I renew my request for unanimous consent, with the understanding that the amendments shall be voted on in their order as they come up, and that not later than 5 o'clock on Thursday afternoon we shall proceed to vote on the bill and the amendments to the final disposition of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I dislike very much to take the position of opposition to anything that may be asked by the chairman of the committee of which I am a member. I feel, however, that it is a mistake for him to call up this matter this evening. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is ready to speak to-night. He wants to go on and finish. We are making headway. There are not very many more Senators who desire to speak. I can conceive of no good that can be accomplished by fixing the date at this time and I can conceive of some harm.

Now, I desire to speak on the bill. I have been trying to find an opportunity for several days; not that I care so much about the RECORD, but there are some things that I should like to speak about, and I should like to speak to the Senators. I know that I would have no one present—I may have no one anyway—if we should agree now to take this vote on Thursday. If that is done, not a single Senator who is not obliged to be here will come here to-morrow or the next day.

We are making rapid progress as we are going at present, and if the Senator will withhold that request until there seems to be some obstacle in the way of progressing rapidly I think better progress will be made. If, for instance, we are through and nobody wants to go on there will be no question about getting consent to that proposal.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, we have thoroughly tested out and demonstrated the fact that whether you fix a time limit or whether you do not fix a time limit, the Senate is not going to come in here and listen to these debates. It has not done so. It did not do so when my persuasive voice was lifted here to discuss the initial features of this bill. [Laughter.] There was hardly anybody here, and if they did not hear me they would not be apt to be persuaded——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from Michigan will permit me, if it is understood, in accordance with the agreement reached between the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Iowa, in colloquy, that any amendment may be called up at any moment to be voted upon, I ask the Senator from Michigan if he does not think that will have a tendency to keep Senators closer to their duty here on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, my experience with these unanimous-consent agreements has not been very satisfactory. If I thought it would expedite the consideration of this bill, I would yield; I would even yield the desire that I have to express my views on this subject; but I do not believe it would. I have seen nothing that indicates any desire or disposition to block the passage of this bill. Of course, there have been times when nobody was ready to go on, and we would adjourn or pass to something else; but if the Senator insists upon holding the bill before the Senate, I am sure we will come to a vote by Thursday afternoon. I do not believe there is any doubt about it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What is the objection to agreeing to it, then?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The objection I have stated before—that it serves notice on every Senator that he need not come. For instance, we are spending time at the present moment in discussing this matter. It is going to require a roll call, with the possibility that we may not get a quorum. Meanwhile, if this time limit had not been proposed, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] would have made his speech this evening, and we would have made that much progress.

Mr. NORRIS. And you would have gotten rid of me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And we would have gotten rid of the Senator from Nebraska. [Laughter.] Therefore I am going to ask the Senator to withhold that request at least until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator that the agreement or understanding that seems to have been reached that any amendments that come up will be voted on when the discussion of them ceases will in all probability guarantee the presence of more Senators on the floor than just to let this debate go on without any idea when you are going to stop it. Senators have not been here, and they are not going to be here; but if it is understood that to-morrow and next day any amendments that may be offered will be disposed of, Senators will be here to see whether or not the amendments meet their approval. That is the understanding, and I shall attempt to hold the Senate in all respects to that understanding.

Now, it will take only a few minutes to call the roll, and it will take only a minute, then, to get unanimous consent; and then, if we have time this afternoon, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] desires to go on this evening, I am sure that he will have as good an audience as could be expected to-morrow morning, under the circumstances. So I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I now renew the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has presented a request for unanimous consent. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Cummins	Kirby	Pittman	Stone
Curtis	Knox	Pomerene	Thomas
Fletcher	Lodge	Ransdell	Tillman
France	McKellar	Robinson	Townsend
Gallinger	Martin	Saulsbury	Underwood
Hale	New	Sheppard	Vardaman
Harding	Norris	Smith, Ga.	Wadsworth
Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Mich.	Watson
Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Smith, S. C.	Wolcott
Kendrick	Page	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators are present—not a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. OWEN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. STERLING, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. HOLLIS. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent on official business.

Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and Mr. GRONNA entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness in his family.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. He has been called to one of the departments on official business.

Mr. KENYON, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. BECKHAM entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. BECKHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. JAMES] is detained on account of illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is detained by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators are present. There is a quorum. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 3752, a bill to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the agreement proposed by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before consent is asked, I should like the Secretary to read again the latter part of the proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary again read the proposed agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he will not consent to a modification——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me say——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment; let me finish my suggestion. I ask the Senator if he will not consent to a modification which will permit at least five minutes' debate upon any amendment that may be offered at any time? We have often under such an agreement had amendments offered where all discussion was cut off, so that it has been embarrassing to Senators to vote upon them. I do not intend to object. I do not intend to obstruct the passage of this very important measure.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator was not present when it was asked by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that beginning to-morrow and going on until we reach a vote a Senator shall call attention to an amendment offered, and it shall then be discussed and disposed of; that each amendment as it comes up shall be discussed and then disposed of on its merits, so as to meet the very difficulty the Senator from Georgia suggests.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the provision of the consent agreement permits amendments to be offered as late as 5 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They will not be of very much importance if they are withheld until that time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator is right.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I certainly am.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it is unwise to make one of these consent agreements that does not permit at least some discussion of an amendment after it is offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the Senator from Georgia is not going to object.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Georgia is not going to object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but I do urge the Senator from South Carolina to put in the agreement a provision to give an additional length of time—it would be very brief—and it would guarantee not to have amendments put to a vote upon which nothing could be said.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. How about beginning at 2 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we would begin on Thursday and limit debate all day Thursday, we would probably get through with the amendments.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Would not from 2 o'clock until 5 o'clock give sufficient time? That would give three hours. I ask that the agreement be changed in that respect, unless there is objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the agreement will be so modified.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to be heard. I am not at all objecting. I remember a few weeks ago, when we had the water-power bill before the Senate and had a unanimous-consent agreement shutting off all debate after a certain hour, a great many amendments suggested themselves to different Senators during the final consideration of the bill, but there was no opportunity presented to say one word in explanation of them. That is a very unsatisfactory condition of affairs in regard to any important bill. It is impossible for any very great delay to occur under a five-minute rule. If we limit the debate on each amendment to five minutes, we can dispose of the bill within a very reasonable time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is what is being done. It is limited from 2 to 5 o'clock.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; you propose to cut off all debate after 5 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is now modified to read from 2 until 5.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then you will have cut off any opportunity even to explain an amendment after 5 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] made the suggestion that from now on, whenever an amendment was offered, that that amendment should be considered and finally disposed of. It seems to me that that is a very good proposition. Of course, that would induce Senators to be present until the bill was disposed of. The Senator has observed that we have not had a very full house during the discussion of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I have wondered several times why the Senator did not ask for a vote on the bill during the time when we did not have any attendance for the consideration of the matter. It seemed to me the Senate was ready to vote at that time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would be much better to force the matter to a decision when the interest in it is lagging rather than to let the debate run for a number of days with the understanding that no action is going to be taken on it. It is rather an encouragement to Senators to absent themselves. We should not then fix a time and lay down an iron-bound rule and cut off every opportunity of expression in regard to a feature of the bill or any question which may suggest itself in regard to it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That we have not done in this case because we shall have Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday after all the debate we have had. There is ample time provided to offer amendments and speak to the amendments. Then from 2 o'clock until 5 o'clock on Thursday any other amendments that may suggest themselves to Senators can be discussed under the 10 and 5 minute rules.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What reason has the Senator for objecting to a five-minute speech upon an amendment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is provided for in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon. After the hour of 5 o'clock there will be no opportunity to be heard.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then we are to vote. We have got to have some definite period at which to start to vote, and I thought three days was ample time for the discussion not only of the bill, which has been discussed at length, but also of any amendments that might suggest themselves. I know of but two or three Senators who want to speak on the bill at any length.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will strike out the words "without further debate" and leave the limitation of five minutes, I shall not object.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then the debate would be absolutely interminable as now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have on a few occasions been embarrassed by the very condition suggested by the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Washington and I had almost resolved that I would never consent to a unanimous-consent agreement for a final vote upon any measure in which I had any interest unless a Senator who offered an amendment should have at least five minutes in which to explain it. I think if this consent agreement was followed by a proviso that after 5 o'clock any Senator offering an amendment might have five minutes in which to explain its purport and that the chairman of the committee should have five minutes in which to reply it would obviate the difficulty which is in the minds of some Senators.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from New Mexico will allow me, the pending bill does not partake of the nature of most bills. The difficulty to which he refers does not arise on this bill. The principles are comparatively simple so far as this legislation is concerned. We have three days in which amendments may be offered, discussed, and disposed of. Then, on the last day, from 2 o'clock until 5 o'clock, the opportunity is given of offering amendments and speaking 10 minutes on the bill and 5 minutes upon any amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator will recall, however, that under a similar agreement the time was occupied upon one or two amendments and finally other amendments were offered and there was absolutely no opportunity to explain them. It seems to me that a Senator should have a right to offer an amendment at any time he wants and that he should have an opportunity to explain for at least five minutes what his amendment means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have modified the agreement and I think it will meet the objection raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington withdraw his objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object to the proposal as it now stands. I will hear what the new proposal is.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have modified the agreement so that it will read:

through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition on said calendar day. No Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me say——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is the calender day. We can stay until midnight and a Senator will have five minutes to speak upon every amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to say to the Senator that I do not object to a speedy disposition of the bill and in regard to this particular proposal I have no objection if you limit the debate to five minutes to each Senator upon the bill and upon each amendment to the bill from to-morrow; but I do object to fixing a time for a final vote on the bill without an opportunity up to the time the final vote is taken to explain an amendment within a limitation of five minutes' time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Does not the Senator think this does that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; it does not. It fixes a time when all debate shall be cut off—that is, at the end of the calendar day. I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator desires to propose a unanimous-consent agreement limiting, as I said before, all debate to five minutes on the bill and on each amendment to the bill I shall have no objection.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the proposition of the Senator is not to fix any time at all. I have heard those propositions before. It is no matter of concern to me except the exigencies that those who are in charge say is upon us to expedite this matter. Those of us who have been here for some length of time know the tendency of interminable debate. It seems to me that it is nothing but reasonable that we shall take the calendar day of Thursday and let the debate run on and let those who offer amendments discuss them without limitation until Thursday, and then from 2 o'clock in the afternoon until 12 o'clock that night anyone who offers an amendment can have an opportunity to discuss it for five minutes. That is what I was attempting to meet. I just wanted a definite time at which we would know when we would dispose of the bill. There are three whole days in which any amendment can be offered and anyone can debate it, and then from 2 o'clock until midnight on Thursday any amendment may be discussed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not necessary, Mr. President, in order to dispose of the bill to stay here until midnight of Thursday or of any other day. I do not think we have arrived at the stage of the consideration of this bill when it is necessary to stay here all night to dispose of it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think not; I merely used that by way of illustration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it could be disposed of much earlier than that, for it is now before the Senate; and when there is no one here on the floor insisting on speaking, the Senator can call for a vote on the bill or on any amendment that may be pending.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. It could be readily disposed of by limiting the debate after a certain time—the time to be fixed to suit the chairman of the committee—to five minutes upon the bill and any amendment to it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As the Senator will remember, the proposed agreement says not later than the time indicated. There are a number of Senators here who think we will dispose of the bill before then. The agreement does not say that at that particular time the bill shall be voted on and disposed of, but "not later" than that time. I am of the opinion that we will get through with it without the five-minute limitation, if the Senator will allow the request for unanimous consent to be agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 19, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 18, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Creator and Lord of sun, moon, and stars; assailed at times by the Psalmist's misgiving we cry, What are man and his transient affairs to Thee? Yet we know of Thy ever-creative imminence in the earth, for Thou art everywhere. And even the humblest of us is subject to the insistent claims of the moral law. And we have the sure testimony of thousands that Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee. Move our faith to Thee, O God, faith in Thy boundless care for us and our importance to Thee. And anchor us to right endeavor with that hope that maketh not ashamed.

In the solemn hush of night; in the broad light of day, with its manifold temptations; in all our sorrows, fears, and joys; and in our present view of a world brokenhearted, drenched in tears, crimson with blood, choked by smoke and hatred, let us glimpse often, we entreat Thee, the unfading glory of Thy majesty and know the changeless decrees of Thy throne and feel the heart-throbs of Thy tender but conquering love.

Let us not deny Thee by despair nor forsake Thee by our shame. But let us expect great things from God and attempt great things for God.

Through Him who yielded his place in heaven and emptied himself of all pride that we might be exalted; who became poor that we might be rich; who took upon Himself the likeness of sinful flesh that we might obtain the spirit; who died that we might have life everlasting. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Saturday, February 16, 1918, and Sunday, February 17, 1918, were read and approved.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted to—

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY (H. DOC. NO. 901).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by acts of Congress approved March 4, 1915, and February 28, 1916, I transmit herewith the report of the United States Bureau of Efficiency for the period from November 1, 1916, to October 31, 1917.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 16 February, 1918.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House to consider the $50,000,000 housing bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, asks unanimous consent that his committee may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House to consider the $50,000,000 housing proposition. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that the bill that was taken from the Committee on Labor?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes. We are engaged in hearings now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes in order to have read a letter from the Director General of Railroads, Mr. McAdoo.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to have a letter from the Director General of Railroads McAdoo read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1918.

MY DEAR JUDGE SIMS: May I take the liberty of expressing the hope that the House may soon be able to take action upon the pending railroad bill?

I can not overemphasize the urgent necessity for prompt action in this matter. This is the time of the year when the railroads should be placing orders for essential equipment and making preparation for those improvements in their facilities which will enable them to meet the great and urgent demands for transportation for which they now not only have insufficient motive power and equipment but, in many cases, inadequate facilities. It is a great task to do the required work in time to get the benefits this year. It is my earnest conviction that every day's delay in setting this work forward is imperiling the success of the war, limiting the industrial efficiency, and jeopardizing the general prosperity and welfare of the country. We can not go forward with many matters of vital moment until the pending railroad bill becomes a law.

With warm regard, I am,

Cordially, yours, W. G. MCADOO.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9807, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Not to exceed $50,000 of the funds derived from the sale of timber from the Red Lake Indian Forest, Minn., under authority of the act of May 18, 1916 (39 Stats., p. 137), may be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in the logging, booming, towing, and manufacturing of timber from burned-over areas at the Red Lake Agency sawmill and in the reimbursement from the said timber receipts of the amounts expended from other Indian tribal funds in the prosecution of such work.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do so for the purpose of inquiring the necessity of including this in a deficiency appropriation bill. It is clearly legislation authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to rotate a fund, contrary to the policy of the Indian Bureau and of the Committee on Indian Affairs for years. We have never permitted the Indian Office to rotate funds of this character.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was not done to make a rotation fund. The reason for it is simply to enable them to cut some timber that has been burnt over, and that will be lost if it is not marketed within a reasonable time. The statement was made that under existing law they did not have any authority to cut this timber, and there did not seem to be any reason why the burnt timber should not be cut and marketed, therefore the committee made the authorization.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I make the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. On what ground does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. On the ground that it is legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair please, it is work that is already under way. They have been cutting some of this timber.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; the Indian Office has never had any authority, and the Secretary of the Interior has never had any authority to rotate funds as proposed in this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. This does not make a rotating fund. That is not the effect of the language. There has been authority given and timber has been cut. If the Chair will indulge me a moment I will find the statute and read it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, yes; the Secretary has been authorized to cut timber, but the money has been converted into the Treasury and appropriated in the regular way. I have no objection to permitting them to go ahead and cut this timber and put the money into the Treasury, and provide for its appropriation in the usual way, but I shall make a point of order against the legislation proposed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know what the gentleman means by "the usual way." This is the usual way, and is simply extending the operations to this burnt-over area.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; he is permitted to use the fund arising from the sale of this timber.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, to cut more of it. And why should he not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Because we have never permitted that sort of thing to be done.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why should it not be done? Can the gentleman state any reason why, at a time when the Treasury is being burdened, we should further burden it by a direct $50,000 appropriation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It happens to be a very large subject, and it is an unwise policy to permit any department of the Government to do this.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would rather have the reason than the conclusion of the gentleman. What is the reason it is unwise?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is unwise because it permits a department of the Government to cut timber and sell it and get the money for it, and use this money as it may see fit, using it as a rotating fund, under the discretion of employees. It is a dangerous policy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that the gentleman's objection is only to the last three lines of the paragraph? The gentleman, I take it, has no objection to allowing $50,000 of funds derived from the sale of timber to be used for this purpose? It is only to the last three lines, I believe, that the gentleman is raising his objection. The lines that I refer to are the following:

And in the reimbursement from the said timber receipts of the amounts expended from other Indian tribal funds in the prosecution of such work.

If those lines were eliminated, would the gentleman have any objection to the remainder?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That would leave it less objectionable.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, the gentleman's objection would then be removed, because they would be limited to a fund of $50,000 derived from the sale of timber, for this purpose, instead of taking the $50,000 out of the General Treasury. This would take the $50,000 from funds that would be derived from the sale of timber on this reservation. I should think that would be satisfactory.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair please, I am prepared to discuss the point of order. In the Indian appropriation bill for 1916 the Secretary is expressly authorized to obtain sawmills and cut lands, and use the interest on the funds derived from the sale of the timber, and this language occurs:

After the payment of all expenses connected with the administration of these lands—

And that includes the lands involved here—

as herein provided, the net proceeds therefrom shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Red Lake Indians and draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. The interest on this fund may be used by the Secretary of the Interior in such manner as he shall consider most advantageous and beneficial to the Red Lake Indians. Expenditure from the principal shall be made only after the approval by Congress of estimates submitted by the said Secretary.

Now, an estimate has been submitted by the Secretary. It is regularly before Congress, has been regularly presented to the committee, and by the committee to the House, and it is up to the House to determine whether it wants to make the appropriation or not. The point of order clearly does not lie. I will send the statute to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky answer this question——

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair caught the reading of the statute it provided that the interest should be used as a revolving fund.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I beg pardon, but——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I aided in the preparation of that statute, and I do not think it bears the construction placed upon it by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course the statute speaks for itself, as all statutes do.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair may be permitted to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question——

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the position of the gentleman from Kentucky that the interest authorized by this statute can be utilized by the Secretary of the Interior as he may deem proper?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is so stated in express terms.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any evidence that the $50,000 proposed to be appropriated here is a part of the interest?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but if the Chair will permit, the very next line says that the principal can be used upon estimates submitted by the Secretary and upon appropriation by Congress, and that is just what we are doing.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there an estimate submitted for this?

Mr. SHERLEY. There was an estimate submitted in due course.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That does not come within the spirit of the law. The money derived from the sale of this timber is placed in the Treasury as other funds are placed in the Treasury, and appropriated in the same manner as other funds. If it were appropriated out of the funds placed in the Treasury as the result of the sale of these lands they would not need to refer to it at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to this language.

After the payment of all expenses connected with the administration of these lands as herein provided, the net proceeds therefrom shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Red Lake Indians.

That does not have to be appropriated by Congress, and then it says:

Expenditure from the principal shall be made only after the approval by Congress of estimates submitted by the said Secretary.

This seems to come within that provision, Congress having reserved to itself the right to state how the principal shall be used.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The intention is to place the money in the Treasury and have it appropriated in the regular way, and it is not necessary to refer to it, as in the first part of this paragraph, as money derived from the sale of this timber. It is in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians and may be appropriated on estimates from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman concedes that estimates have been sent in for this item?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I assume that they have been.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no doubt about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the examination and classification of lands requisite to the determination of their suitability for enlarged homesteads, stock-raising homesteads, public watering places, and stock driveways, as required by the public-land laws, $150,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I understand the appropriation of $150,000 for the examining and classification of lands requisite to the determination of their suitability for enlarged homesteads is not limited to the Territory of Alaska?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it has no relation to Alaska at all. It relates to lands in a homestead act which we passed which requires their classification before they shall be open to homesteaders. There are several hundred thousand now waiting to go on these lands, and there has been a very insistent demand that the work should go forward.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For temporary and auxiliary clerk hire and for substitute clerk hire for clerks and employees absent with pay at first and second class post offices and temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post offices, $1,800,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, many statements have been made in this House about the trouble with the mails going to our soldiers in France. This morning it happens that I received three letters much in the line of others which I have received. One was a little different, because it refers particularly to Christmas boxes. It said that in November the War Department issued a circular stating that any box weighing not over 20 pounds marked "Christmas box" and addressed to a soldier in France and sent so it would be received in New York on or before December 5 would be delivered free of charge on Christmas morning in France. He says that he sent two boxes—one on November 27 and one on November 29—so they had plenty of time to reach New York before December 5, and that they did reach there, and yet 10 days ago he learned from a friend who had received a letter from his son, written on Christmas day, that he had received no box from home, though he had received several parcel-post packages from other people. Neither of the boxes, which were of considerable value, arrived at all. He said that the value of the boxes was considerable, but the main cause of regret is the disappointment of the boy in France.

I have also received a letter from a lady, who says:

I am writing this letter to call your attention to the mail service to the boys in France. My brother left Massachusetts in September and writes me a letter, dated November 23, that he has received only one letter from the good old U. S. A. I have written 15 letters, and his mother has sent him still more. We sent him three packages, none of which he has received. He writes that he is very lonesome (he is only a boy) and very much worried because he does not hear from home.

In the same mail I received another letter of the same purport. It says:

My son has been in France since the first part of December, and from that time to this we have sent him a Christmas box, mailed letters, two or three a week, sent newspapers once or twice a week, magazines, knitted articles—such as helmets, scarfs, sweaters—cigarettes, candy, fountain pen, and things too numerous to mention. I received a letter from him yesterday, dated January 27, and up to that time from the last part of December he had not received any of the many things sent.

I state these things in corroboration of the many statements which have been made in the hope that the Post Office Department will increase its efforts to remedy these shameful miscarriages.

The Clerk read as follows:

The proceeds heretofore or hereafter received from the disposition of nitrate of soda under the appropriation of $10,000,000 contained in section 27 of the act approved August 10, 1917, shall be credited to the said appropriation of $10,000,000 and be available for the purposes authorized in the said action during the period of the existing war as defined by section 24 of the said act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, to ask the chairman what special reason there is for inserting this here.

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason was that it came to the attention of the committee that the Agricultural Department had obtained a certain amount of nitrates which had been disposed of; that there was a demand for very much more than that. And while the Agricultural Department was not certain whether it would be able to get additional ships or not, if it could get the ships it was desirable to have this money available for the procurement of the additional nitrates for agricultural purposes. It further appeared that an amendment to this effect was placed on the Agricultural bill in the Senate; that the matter was agreeable to the Agricultural Committee of the House, and it was put up in here rather than in the Agricultural bill to make it available earlier should the contingencies arise which might make it necessary.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That was the very point I was coming to. It seemed to me this was a matter that ought to come within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SHERLEY. We would not have touched it except with the understanding that it was acceptable to the chairman and, as I said, to the committee, and that a similar provision was pending to the Agricultural bill in the Senate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, it seems to me——

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] was the mover in the matter and I think could give the gentleman even fuller information than I can, but that is my understanding, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think this provision ought to be contained in the bill. My understanding is that the Agricultural Committee will shortly come in with another bill——

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest the gentleman let the matter be passed for the present.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would ask then unanimous consent that this matter may be passed for the present——

Mr. SHERLEY. With the point of order pending?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With the point of order pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this item be passed temporarily with the point of order pending. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional for procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds as authorized by section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," approved August 10, 1917, including not to exceed $5,000 for rent and personal services in the District of Columbia, $4,000,000, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 76, line 3, after the figures "$4,000,000," insert:

"Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may sell the said seed to farmers on security approved by the Secretary and under rules and regulations prescribed by him."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of discussion throughout the country during the past two months in regard to Congress making an appropriation for encouraging the sowing of the largest possible acreage of grain crops next spring. In the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture held a few days ago, Food Administrator Mr. Herbert C. Hoover stated that in his judgment it was advisable for the Government at this time to do everything possible to encourage the sowing of the greatest possible acreage of spring wheat next spring. He stated at the hearing that it was quite evident that there was going to be a shortage of wheat in the country this year, and as all winter wheat had already been sown the only thing that could be done now to increase the acreage of wheat would be to encourage the sowing of a greater acreage of spring wheat. There are a number of districts in the country where there was a crop failure of spring wheat last year that can be greatly helped out if the Secretary of Agriculture is given by Congress the right to sell seed wheat on time to farmers who will put it in and increase the crop of spring wheat. My amendment provides that this wheat can be sold on time, on security approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and under rules and regulations prescribed by him.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORTON. I will.

Mr. FLOOD. What is the suggestion of the gentleman as to where this wheat will be stored and sold?

Mr. NORTON. It should be stored in and sold from the local elevators in the communities where it is to be sown. I will say, as far as the needs of my State are concerned I believe they have been already largely taken care of. Recently the Legislative Assembly of North Dakota met in special session and amended and extended the provisions of the county seed-bonding law of the State. Under the provisions of this amended county seed-bonding law the need for seed in my State can be pretty well taken care of. There is, however, need in many parts of the country for the legislation which my amendment proposes. Its adoption would largely increase the acreage of spring wheat to be sown next spring in Montana, Wyoming, and North and South Dakota.

Mr. FLOOD. Now, is the proposition to have the Government buy this wheat and send it to each county in those States and have from here a distribution of seeds?

Mr. NORTON. The purpose of my amendment is this, to permit the Secretary of Agriculture, where seed can not be obtained in any other way by farmers who are prepared to sow the seed properly to sell seed to them on time and under rules and regulations prescribed by him to safeguard the Government. I have talked the matter over with the Secretary, and I am certain that in the administration of the provision proposed by my amendment he will be very conservative. He would, I am sure, only authorize the sale of these seeds on time when and where the carrying out of this policy would greatly encourage sowing a greater crop acreage next spring and where the sowing of this increased acreage would be likely to benefit the whole Nation through a large addition to our total food supply at the next harvest.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. I will.

Mr. GOOD. Now, in exercising that privilege he will, of course, grant credit only to the farmer who could not get credit locally?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. Then he is granting credit to people who are not entitled to credit from a financial point of view, and as a result the Government would have in a short time bills against every bankrupt farmer who wanted to buy wheat?

Mr. NORTON. Oh, I do not think that is so. I will say this to the gentleman: I think the need for an increased supply of foodstuffs is so great in this country at the present time that the Government would be well justified in adopting the policy of advancing money on time to supply seed to be sown in agricultural districts of the country where, under ordinary circumstances, good crop yields will be returned much more than sufficient in value to pay all the expenses for the seed furnished and for the sowing, harvesting, and marketing of the crops.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment, and I would like to have a little time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the point of order. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order, or does he desire to discuss the merits of the proposition? The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am willing to reserve the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota. I am afraid that the committee has gone further in this respect in granting an appropriation of $4,000,000 for the purchase of seed in this emergency than it ought to have gone. At any rate, it has appropriated ample. The proposition smacks a little too much of paternalism to suit me, and I represent an entirely agricultural community. I would do nothing to hamper this great industry. I have read with interest the extended hearings on this subject, and there is not a word with regard to a shortage of wheat seed; not a word with regard to the need of cotton seed; not a word with regard to the shortage of barley seed or flax seed; certainly not a word as to the need of peanuts; and the Secretary of Agriculture came before the committee and said that because of the cold season last year, especially in the Northwest and Middle West, there was a great amount of soft corn, in some localities the moisture being as high as 80 per cent, and in but a few was the moisture as low as 20 per cent. And the department has felt that the farmers in the corn belt were going to have trouble in buying suitable seed corn for the spring planting. We have here an estimate of the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seed. His estimate is as follows:

Purchases of seed that are being made under the provisions of section 3 of Public No. 40. $2,500,000.

Crop.	Estimated quantity to be purchased.	Estimated cost, including all overhead charges.	Purchases commenced.	Purchases must conclude.	Sales commenced or will commence.	Sales to date, Jan. 31, 1918. Let us look at this estimate. $750,000 with which to purchase seed oats. We never had a better oat crop than we had last year throughout the length and breadth of the United States, and every bushel is suitable for seed. And yet at a time when oats were selling around 60 cents a bushel it is proposed to buy them for a dollar a bushel and sell them to the farmer at a dollar a bushel when the farmers can buy the seed oats for much less. There is something out of joint here.

What else did he propose to do? In time of war he intended to spend $250,000 for the purchase of seed peanuts. Not a word in the hearings with regard to peanuts. Is there a scarcity of peanuts for seed? No one has said there was, so far as I can know. If there is, ought we not to have heard something about it? Why, then, should our Government loan $250,000 to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to buy peanuts?

Now, I know nothing about the cotton situation, and yet the Secretary of Agriculture proposes to purchase $200,000 worth of cotton seed. Is there a shortage? If so, to what extent does it exist? How far would $200,000 worth of cotton seed go to relieve the situation in the South if there is a demand for cotton seed because of poor seed or of shortage?

Take it in my own section. It is proposed now, in the face of a great shortage, to purchase only 50,000 bushels of seed corn. That amount of seed corn is not enough to plant the corn in two of the counties of my district. I doubt if it is enough to purchase enough for one. And at the same time they propose to buy 125,000 bushels of soy beans, and anybody who knows anything about that part of the country knows that there is not one farmer in a hundred growing soy beans. Is this an attempt to deprive the corn farmer of seed corn and force soy beans on him instead?

Now, what is the situation? There appears to be a total lack of comprehensive knowledge with regard to these seeds, the needs of the country so far as the things in which there is a shortage are concerned. There was a good reason to do something for seed corn in the corn belt, because we had the poorest crop of corn so far as quality is concerned that we ever had, and business men and farmers and bankers look with some apprehension on the coming spring so far as having a quality of seed that can be relied on is concerned. Throughout Illinois and Indiana and Iowa and Missouri and Nebraska, in those corn States, what did these men do? The farmers organized through their local agents, and with the aid of the banks and business houses and manufacturers they took a census of the corn that was suitable for seed purposes. In my own State the governor required a comprehensive survey to be made, and those reports are coming in, and all the corn of last year that is suitable for seed corn is being located and conserved, and the corn of last year that matured so that it would make good seed corn is being set aside. The business man and the farmers and the bankers are doing that work. And this fund will go to but a very limited extent to relieve that situation. What is true in Iowa I conclude to be true in the corn belt.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REAVIS. Has not that survey disclosed that, generally speaking, the 1917 crop is unfit for seed corn in that locality?

Mr. GOOD. The survey, according to a dispatch that I saw from one county in my State, and it is a representative county, showed that there was about 2 to 5 bushels per school district of shortage, taking into consideration the corn that was raised last year that was suitable for seed. I think this estimate includes the corn of the 1916 crop that had been preserved and could be used for seed.

Mr. REAVIS. What I am trying to learn is this: Is practically all the seed corn suitable for your locality confined to the 1916 crop?

Mr. GOOD. I think a great deal of it is; but there is some good seed corn in the 1917 crop.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. I take it the gentleman knows that at the present time the Food Administration is trying, by regulations which it is putting into force, to reduce the consumption of wheat during the coming six months in this country 30 per cent, and that this policy is being resorted to on account of the great needs of this country and our allies for wheat and wheat products. I take it the gentleman knows that, as far as it now can be seen, there is going to be a large shortage in the wheat crop of this year. Would the gentleman, then, be opposed to having the Secretary of Agriculture given the right to furnish seed wheat on time to farmers in districts where they could not otherwise secure seed, if on being so supplied with seed wheat they would plant it, care for it, and harvest it and add greatly to the Nation's total wheat supply for this year?

Mr. GOOD. No; if they could not otherwise get it; but there is no community in the whole United States that is so unpatriotic that would not respond and furnish the funds to purchase seed wheat to seed every acre of available land, and the gentleman knows it; and the gentleman knows that in his own State——

Mr. NORTON. If what the gentleman asserts is true, then if the authority proposed by my amendment is given the Secretary of Agriculture he would find no occasion to use it.

Mr. GOOD. I think there might be very good reason for some activity on the part of the Department of Agriculture, but I think we are going too far, and even with this reduced appropriation, I think perhaps it is more than it ought to appropriate for the purchase of seeds whether there is a shortage or not. I am for the provision, but I think that we ought not to extend Government agencies in this direction; we should limit this authority. We are purchasing cotton seed and peanut seed and oats. At the time this estimate was made oats were selling for about 60 cents a bushel. Farmers could buy them for that sum. And it is here proposed to pay $1 a bushel, and they will cost that amount plus costs of administration.

And I notice in the estimates for storage it is proposed to spend considerable for storage here in the District of Columbia. There is no need for storing a bushel of corn, or peanuts, or anything of that kind here in the District of Columbia. The need is in the localities where they raise these things, and therefore need the seed for the coming spring.

Mr. NORTON. I quite agree with the gentleman in that. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do not believe the Government ought to go into the business of extending credit to the farmers for these purposes, and I do not believe the farmers of the United States want it. Under all the circumstances not a dollar should be expended for peanuts, and not a dollar for other seeds, except where there is actual shortage in certain localities.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the fact that the Government might stand to lose something in granting credit by furnishing seed for these people in the Northern States in order to increase the wheat raised is not conclusive to my mind. The Government has undertaken to encourage the farmers of the Northwest to produce food in large quantities, and the Government can not expect to go the whole way in the matter of encouragement unless it will take some risk itself.

Throughout the States of Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, and other States people who feed cattle have responded to the appeal of the Government to place every possible pound of meat upon each brute for the purpose of having a large food production. They patriotically went into the markets last fall and bought feeders at from 10 to 12 cents a pound. Now, after they have fed them at large expense high-priced grain and hay, they are unable to get much, if anything, more than the price that they paid per pound. Everybody who ever fed a steer knows that means a large loss to every owner of every finished steer. On present market prices there is a loss of from $10 to $30 on every finished steer. In common with many of my neighbors, in obedience to the appeal of the Government for a maximum of meat production, I am finishing some at a loss; the lighter ones will probably pay out.

So if the Government of the United States is asking the farmers to increase their acreage of wheat, we know that the only opportunity now is to increase the spring-wheat area. If the Government is asking the farmers to increase their acreage, it should not be so finicky about the possibility of suffering a small loss.

I do not think the people in my State would profit much by the amendment suggested by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON]. That is a newer State, confined largely to spring wheat, while our State is a dual wheat State—winter and spring. From statements I heard made by men living in North Dakota, as well as by Representatives here on the floor, it appears that there are large areas up there which will go unsown unless some substantial aid is given. The mere fact that the Government is running a little risk when it is asking that a great risk shall be run by the farmer who will furnish the land and the toil is to me not conclusive. The amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota should prevail.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment.

This paragraph proposes to give $4,000,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture for the uses of a revolving fund in connection with the procuring, storing, and furnishing of seed, on the ground that it may be necessary as a war-emergency measure. This item may be all right at the present time, but it looks like an entering wedge for a larger distribution of seed concerning which a propaganda is sweeping over the Northwest and certain other sections of the country. I regret to make this comment in the absence of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER], who seems to be the leading exponent of this new idea, and who has introduced a bill which has been widely commented upon throughout the country, particularly in the country press; but his bill appropriates $50,000,000 for the purchase and distribution of seed, for which the Government is to take the promissory notes of such selected farmers as are fortunate enough to get the seed on these terms.

I think it well to call attention to the importance of the bill introduced by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER]. It is a bold and radical departure from the existing order. Section 4 of his bill, which has been widely commented upon in the country press, provides that the money therein appropriated shall be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture in the purchase of seed and grain in connection with the necessary expense incurred in carrying out the provisions of the act, and that the grain and seed shall be sold and distributed to the farmers and stockmen mentioned at a price not to exceed the cost to the Government, the purchaser to give a promissory note therefor, payable one year from date, to the Treasury of the United States, and bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum.

Now, this project is being widely discussed. It is proposed to reach into the Treasury of the United States in these times of war and take out $50,000,000 to buy seed to be turned over to certain stockmen, farmers, and ranchmen in certain States on the strength of promissory notes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no evidence that they are to have collateral property. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. Is not the United States advancing now at least 30 per cent to certain manufacturing concerns to obtain supplies that they deem of importance to the winning of this war, and is there anything more important than the matter of production of food for the winning of this war?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have heard that the administration is sanctioning certain advances to manufacturers and munition makers and others for the purpose of producing munitions of war.

Mr. SLOAN. You have heard that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I have heard, I may say, almost the whole story in committee.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HELVERING. That is by virtue of the law passed by the last Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I presume it is by virtue of law, war-emergency law, otherwise the administration would not have followed this method. But the method is subject to abuses even during the war.

I have little to say about the question of lending or advancing 30 per cent to munition manufacturers, except that in that case there is property upon which the Government may fall back to recoup its losses. I presume the administration is wise enough to protect itself in regard to advances thus made for the purpose of hastening war preparations. But I question whether we have that protection in connection with this $50,000,000 seed proposition. We have there only the individual promise to pay. We have run wild in the matter of expense due to the war. We have advanced and loaned money to munition makers for the production of war material, and we have aided the farmers, but I doubt whether we have yet arrived at that stage of paternalism in the United States where we are prepared to use the tax money of the people to make advances to men who have only something in prospect to redeem their promises.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, it may take a great war to shake the reactionary and stand-pat proclivities of my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. He is treating this proposition very lightly. I believe the most serious condition that confronts the United States in any of its present activities in preparation for this war is the crop of 1918.

I want to tell the gentleman something about the section of the country that produces a good deal of foodstuffs as well as practically all the cotton that goes to clothe the people of this country. These big northern contractors who have been sent down there to build these great Government works—and it looks now as if nobody could build anything in that country except one of these fellows from away off, and mighty few local contractors can do anything in that country—they come down there and they utterly disregard how they gather labor. They do not care if they take every hand off of a man's farm. They do not care how much they disrupt a man's business, just so they get the labor they want. Now, what is going to happen? In the first place, since December, 1916, up to the 31st day of December, 1917, 112,000 negroes left the State of Georgia alone. They were attracted by the high prices paid for labor in the great civic centers. The draft came along—very properly—and it has taken a great many of the boys off of the farms.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the difficulty in the factories. They have taken them out of the factories in a larger percentage and have disorganized them.

Mr. HOWARD. That is true; but here is a proposition to increase the supply of food, and I assume that Napoleon was right when he said that an army travels on its stomach. I am trying to show you that this Government has got to do radical things to encourage the production of food for this year, and you can not wait until April or May to do it. You have got to do it now, and, in my judgment, you can not give the farmers of this country any too much encouragement to produce food. Some of you gentlemen were very anxious to fix a price on cotton that would not pay for the cost of planting. I will venture the prediction now that if they use every available man and every available mule in the South to put cotton seed into the ground there will not be 9,000,000 bales of cotton produced in the South in the year 1918.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman think there is any more reason for fixing the price of wheat than there was for fixing the price of cotton?

Mr. HOWARD. Not any, if you fix a minimum. What was the use to fix a price on wheat if you did not fix the price of the manufactured product somewhere? What is the use of fixing a price on raw cotton if you turn your cotton mills loose to charge 40 or 50 cents a yard for cotton cloth? When we fix a price on cotton we are going to save the people of this country from paying exorbitant prices for the manufactured cotton, because we are going to fix a price on that, too, on a cost-plus basis. Mark that prediction.

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say to the gentleman that he had better ask the President why the consumers have not been looked after.

Mr. HOWARD. The consumers are being looked after; but the trouble about this whole war is, in some quarters—and it is pretty well distributed over the country—that there is a good deal of patriotism exhibited when there is a dollar of profit in it; and if you can fix some plan to stop the profiteers from operating right now during this war, and will present it to this Congress so that we can act on it, so as to stop it, the Washington Monument will not be as high as an ant hill by the side of the monument that the people of this country will erect to your memory. Now, you get busy and see what you can do. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, I am not President.

Mr. HOWARD. Thank the Lord for that.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not come from an agricultural district. At the same time I believe that next to the need of ships our greatest need, and the most disquieting situation to-day, is the production of food for this coming year. So I think everything we can do which is going to stimulate food production we ought to do. I heartily acquiesce in this proposition of the committee, and my only fear is, as the gentleman from Iowa indicated, that it is not large enough or rightly proportioned to accomplish the purpose intended. But as there is a revolving-fund proposition wrapped up in it, it may be that it will achieve more than I expect. From all I can learn, it seems to me that what is troubling the farmers and preventing their setting out for an enormous production of foodstuffs this year is not only the lack of seed but a fear of the lack of labor. And it seems to me that we ought also—although perhaps that is a matter exclusively within the power of the administration—to provide, just as far as we can, that a labor supply shall be given to the farmer, because he is not going to buy seed and sow seed if he does not think he can reap the crops when they mature. As I understand it, last year enormous crops lay and rotted simply for lack of labor to harvest them. I think the remedy is either by arranging the draft law so that farm laborers shall not be taken or by paroling men from our cantonments to go back to the farms, so that the farmers can have the skilled labor which they need to harvest the crops, and therefore stimulate the farmers to plant this spring.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that the shortage of labor which troubles the farmer also troubles the shipbuilder?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And is it not true that the shipbuilder is just as important in this war as the producer of food?

Mr. GILLETT. I said at the beginning that it seemed to me that to-day the first instance where we are likely to fall down is on shipping, and next on food, but the trouble has been, I think, that a large part of the farm labor, even before the draft, was drawn away from the farm by the attractiveness of the wages paid by munition factories and shipyards; so that even before the draft began the farmer had a very small quota of labor compared with what he had before and compared with what he needs.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman certainly would not take labor away from the shipyards or from the great industrial establishments and send it back to the farms again?

Mr. GILLETT. I said the only proposition that occurred to me, or the easiest one, is to send the experienced farmers from the cantonments and the National Guard camps.

Mr. NORTON. That is just exactly the point, that the men are being drawn from the farms to the shipyards where they are paid from $6 to $15 a day, and a man can not afford to stay on the farm and raise wheat at $2.20 a bushel. The farmer who raises that wheat can not afford to pay more than $2 a day for help.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the administration already has in mind some military proposition looking toward the possibility of utilizing the Army for industrial purposes, or a part of it, when occasion may demand, and legislation to that effect is under consideration.

Mr. GILLETT. I am much obliged to the gentleman; I am not in the secrets of administrative legislation as much as is the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would accept that as a compliment if I thought there was a compliment in it.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman understands that it has not been the draft that has drawn the men away from the farms but the allurement of higher prices elsewhere.

Mr. GILLETT. But the draft also.

Mr. TILSON. The figures show that the percentage of men drawn away from the farms and inducted into the military service has been almost negligible. The percentage has been very small. I call the gentleman's attention to the report of the Provost Marshal General. The real point is that they have been drawn away from the farm to these other places that pay them very much better than they were ever paid on the farm. There has been little difficulty from the draft itself.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course, we recognize that the farmer can not pay larger prices and still sell his produce at a profit, and therefore he is tempted not to increase production to the point that the country needs.

Mr. TILSON. That is true.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad if the Chair would inform the committee what the matter is now pending before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). It is an amendment to which a point of order has been reserved.

Mr. CANNON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. I gave notice when the bill was taken up that I would offer an amendment to this section, and I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute to the amendment now pending against which the point of order is reserved. Can I offer that amendment now with the point of order reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order has been called for. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his demand?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; Mr. Chairman, let the brethren talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order. Section 3 of this law provides:

> That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized to purchase or contract with persons to grow such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them to farmers for cash, at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation.

I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph in the bill is in aid of section 3, the food survey law. That provides that the Secretary shall sell for cash. The amendment provides that the Secretary shall have authority to sell it for credit. That is an enlargement of the power of the Secretary; it is legislation on an appropriation bill and is out of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment as a substitute for the paragraph.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the paragraph. Would not that come in ahead of the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to perfect the paragraph comes in ahead of the substitute.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know whether it is to perfect the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "fund," line 4, page 76, add "and a like revolving fund of $4 000.000 to loan for the purchase of machinery."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. That involves the same point that the Chair has already ruled upon.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, it has been said that what the farmer needs is more labor, that although we may buy them the seed or sell it to them, yet if they have not the labor to do the work they can not produce the crops. It is manifest to anybody who knows anything about a farm that if we have the proper machinery we can produce larger crops with a much smaller amount of labor. There are many farmers in the country who would put in more crops, purchase seed, and raise more for the American people, but they are absolutely unable financially to purchase the machinery necessary to carry on the farm according to modern ideas. My amendment would help them in this way. You could lend the man the money to buy the seed, or purchase seed and sell it to him, and at the same time you could lend him the money or purchase machinery and sell it to him on time, so that he could produce a larger crop. If we have proper machinery on the farms we can do the labor with one-third less men than heretofore necessary on the farm. While the large majority of farmers able to purchase the machinery and do so, and raise large crops, there is a certain class who are absolutely afraid of debt, as afraid of debt as a man is of fire. These timid, though capable, farmers are the ones I wish to reach.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What kind of machinery would save one-third of the labor on the farm at the present time?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Small tractors, drills, etc.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have already got them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am talking about the farmer who has not them and who has not the money to purchase them.

Mr. HOWARD. He can not buy Ford tractors now.

Mr. LINTHICUM. There are a lot of other good tractors besides Ford tractors.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman know of any small farmers who have felt warranted to put in tractors?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think a small tractor could be used in a small field.

Mr. KNUTSON. You have to have at least 80 acres to make it pay.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, no; I own farms myself, and you can use a tractor on a 10-acre field to advantage. I have used them.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am a farmer.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why, a small tractor can be used to advantage on an acre of ground.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman were representing a bank to which a request for money to buy tractors had been made, what sort of security would the gentleman require?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say that I have represented clients and that I have loaned money to farmers all of my life. I have loaned it to them on their individual promissory notes, and also with an indorsement, and I have yet to find a farmer who refused to pay his bills when he was able to do so. I find they are nearly always able to meet these demands. I do not know that we should compel land security. A farmer can often raise half or third of the money necessary for the machinery, and the balance can be loaned on chattel mortgage on the machinery.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman put the Government in the position of providing a fund of $4,000,000 with which to buy machinery to give to farmers, taking as security for it their promissory notes?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I should not want to lend it to all farmers on promissory notes, but I think that there are many farmers to whom the Government can safely lend $4,000,000 in small sums with which to buy farm machinery.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman do the same thing for a man who came forward and said, "I would like to build a mill, or engage in an industrial enterprise, but I have no money"?

Mr. LINTHICUM. We are doing it to-day. Did not the gentleman vote the other day to put up houses, investing the sum of $50,000,000, for workers at the mills?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We did not vote on the bill, but I would do it because of an emergency of war, as represented by the President.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman not look upon food as just as much an emergency of war as munitions?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I do; but I would like to have some assurance that the food was going to be produced. Cotton, for instance, is not food, yet cotton seed are provided for here.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think that if you leave it to the farmers and give them proper support, you will have that assurance.

Mr. FARR. We have appropriated millions of dollars for the enlargement of plants for the building of aeroplanes. Farm tractors and other labor-saving machinery would greatly add to the production of food so greatly needed, and the Government could be very helpful in doing this.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly; and we are lending in every way for manufacturing munitions and housing and for building aeroplanes, and I think $4,000,000 could be easily risked to let the farmers produce larger crops.

Mr. NORTON. Does not the gentleman base his amendment on a war emergency?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Absolutely.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would the gentleman accept an amendment so that city dwellers could get tractors with which to plow their gardens?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL offers the following substitute for the paragraph beginning on line 21, page 75:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the need for food and seed crops by purchasing or contracting with persons who grow seeds suitable for the production of food crops and to store, transport, and furnish such seed to farmers for cash at approximately the cost of the same or on credit with approved security of financial or business organizations guaranteeing the same, $6,000,000, and this fund may be used as a revolving fund until the Secretary of Agriculture determines that no such emergency exists, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay all such expenses, including rent, and to employ such persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and to cooperate with such State authorities or local organizations or individuals as he may deem necessary."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the item for which we are providing a deficiency originally was $2,500,000, and out of a proposed appropriation of $6,000,000 the committee has granted four. This provides for the purchase of seeds and their sale at cost. It is a splendid provision of law. Much good has been accomplished under it, but there are conditions in the western country that make it impossible for people in considerable areas out there to avail themselves of this opportunity to buy for cash. The Agricultural Department very properly objects to selling to individual farmers on credit, but in our country for years past we have in almost every county voluntary organizations of bankers and business men who have guaranteed $5,000, $10,000, $15,000, $20,000, or whatever sum was believed to be necessary for seeds. They have guaranteed this amount of seed purchased by the farmers, and I think there has scarcely been a case where the sums borrowed have not been returned. My amendment increases the item in the bill to the amount of the estimate, increasing it by $2,000,000, and provides that the seeds may be sold for cash or they may be sold on credit on approved security of responsible organizations. In other words, the Secretary of Agriculture could take advantage of these organizations in the various sections of the country where conditions of drought—lack of accumulated capital—render it difficult to secure the capital with which to pay cash for these seeds. He could communicate and negotiate with those associations and distribute such quantity of seeds in the community as these associations, bankers, business men, stockmen, and farmers would obligate themselves to pay for.

Those associations would be very glad to distribute the seeds. They would see that they only got into the hands of those who would pay for them. The Government would be safeguarded, first, by the supervision of these responsible people, and then by the fact that they themselves were responsible to the Government for payment. We have a very considerable area of western country that has been subjected to exceedingly severe drought conditions. Our country is not one of accumulated capital. Local organizations are finding it more and more difficult to advance the money for seeds. We need seeds; we need increased agricultural production. We have great areas there where potatoes can be grown in increased quantities, sugar beets, wheat, and rye. The Secretary would not take advantage of this provision in old communities where there are accumulations of capital and where the people locally should obligate themselves to aid those who are needing seeds. It could be utilized in all that territory from west Texas which has been suffering so severely, on north to Montana, where last year they had a dreadful condition of drought among the new settlers who have no accumulations of capital and who are not in position to pay cash, and the banks in those communities are not so situated that they can advance these sums. We are lending aid and assistance in every direction for the prosecution of the war. Here is a sound business proposition. I do not wonder the Secretary of Agriculture does not want to go into the business of loaning to individual farmers. My provision is one under which the Secretary would only have to deal with organizations here and there, perhaps one in a county.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. SLOAN. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to add to "financial or business," "business or farmers' organizations"?

Mr. MONDELL. I would be delighted to do that. I used the terms I did, knowing that my amendment would go out on the point of order, to make it very clear to the Secretary of Agriculture and others whom we need to persuade to change their minds. That we were expecting them to depend only upon very reliable people, not that farmers are not just as reliable as the folks in town, but I suggested business organizations, bankers, and business men to emphasize the business nature of these organizations. Yes, organizations of bankers, business men, and farmers, such that the Secretary shall know that they are reliable and responsible. In our country it has been in the main the large stockmen and larger farmers helping out with the bankers and business men. Mr. Chairman, this item will go out on the point of order, but I am proposing another amendment reducing the appropriation under the Holman rule, which should not go out on the point of order. That will be offered after the point of order is made and sustained to this item.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist upon his point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending, which I offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. MONDELL for the paragraph beginning on line 21, page 75, and ending on line 4, page 76:

"For additional for procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds as authorized by section 3 of the act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products,' approved August 10, 1917, including not to exceed $5,000 for rent and personal service in the district of Columbia, $3,999,000, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918, and the seeds secured and purchased out of this appropriation may be sold to farmers for cash at their approximate cost, or on credit with approved security of responsible organizations guaranteeing the repayment of same."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment fairly comes within the Holman rule. It is in the language of the item as it is in the bill, reduces the appropriation $1, and provides that these seeds may be sold on credit with approved security to certain organizations. The gentleman from Kentucky has not pointed out in what way the language is subject to the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not want to interrupt the gentleman's argument.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to know what the gentleman's point of order is.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill and therefore not in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Legislation, Mr. Chairman, is in order on an appropriation bill under certain conditions if it reduces expenditures—the amount carried in the bill—which this does.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman has concluded his argument, I will be glad to present the reasons why I do not think it comes within the Holman rule.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to hear the reasons, and I am very sure the Chair would.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, I did not want to interrupt the gentleman, and that is the reason I permitted him to continue ad libitum.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want to take up the time of the committee unnecessarily.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason that the matter is subject to the point of order is because the legislative part of it does not in any sense result in a reduction of the expenditure. If the gentleman's broad contention was true all you would have to do touching any amendment to make it in order would be to reduce by 1 cent any money item in a bill, then add whatever language you pleased, and, according to the gentleman's contention, you would thereby be reducing the expenditure. But the rule was not made for that sort of a case. The rule is that for an amendment to be in order under the Holman rule it must be of such a character as to result in a reduction of salaries or expenses or the general amount carried in the bill. Not even the ingenuity of the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming, exerted in a cause that is most dear to his heart, that of the farmer, is sufficient to enable him or anybody else to show that selling on credit instead of for cash will save money to the Government of the United States, and I submit the matter is manifestly subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The situation developed by this amendment is as follows: The amendment first proposes to reduce the amount carried in this paragraph. That is perfectly competent under parliamentary law. In addition it is proposed for legislation to accompany the reducing portion of the amendment. But this legislation has no sort of relation to the proposed reduction. It is perfectly competent to legislate on an appropriation bill, provided the legislation proposed necessarily effects a reduction; but it is just as plainly incompetent to propose a reducing amendment to an appropriation bill a motion which can be made at any time without reference to the Holman rule and then undertake to attach to this motion legislation which does not effect the reduction and is not in any wise related to it.

Now, that is the situation presented by the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and his amendment is plainly out of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOOD and Mr. MORGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa, a member of the committee, submits an amendment, which he will send to the desk and the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: At the end of line 4, on page 76, insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for the purchase of seeds of any kind except in cases where the Secretary of Agriculture shall find there is a shortage of seed of such variety."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to do anything to cripple the Department of Agriculture in this regard. I do not want to do a thing that will prevent the largest possible production of agricultural products, but I want to say frankly and earnestly that I am amazed at the statement of the Department of Agriculture with regard to what they did with the $2,500,000 appropriated for this purpose and what they now proposed to do with the $6,000,000 asked for.

I have objected to river and harbor appropriations because they were trades, and I am opposed to this because it seems to be on the same kind of a basis. For instance, under the $2,500,000 appropriation we find the Secretary purchased, for Texas, corn, $75,000; cotton, $290,000; sorghum, $310,000; peanuts, $215,000—or $890,000. Then for the Northwest—Montana and North Dakota—barley, $339,500; flax, $210,000; oats, $250,000—or $800,000, the same amount that was given to Texas; and then corn for the Northwest. And, mind you, in these hearings the only thing that is pointed out by the department where there is an actual shortage is in corn; and yet all the rest of the corn-producing part of the country outside of Texas was only given $610,000. Six hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars were spent by the department for corn seed, the only seed mentioned by the department where there is an actual shortage, but $215,000 was spent for peanuts. Are we going to win this war by raising peanuts? There is not a word here that there is a shortage of peanuts or that the peanut seeds are defective; yet the Secretary of Agriculture, out of this appropriation of $6,000,000, is asking for peanuts $250,000, in addition to the $215,000 already spent for such purpose. Not a word that there is a shortage of cotton seed, and yet he wants $500,000 for cotton seed. Not a word that there is a shortage of sorghum seed, and yet he wants $500,000 for that.

Now, I know nothing about a shortage of these seeds. There may be a shortage. But I want to say that the man, I care not what his position may be, who will say that there is a shortage in the United States of oat seed, that the yield in the United States is poor, does not know what he is talking about; and yet they propose here to spend of the $6,000,000 estimated for, $750,000 for oat seed where there is no shortage at all.

Now, what does the amendment accomplish? It does not strike down by a single penny the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seed, but it does provide he shall not use this fund except to purchase seed where there is a shortage, and he will determine where there is a shortage. That is just what we want to accomplish; and yet under the administration of that law we are not accomplishing that at all. We are giving certain sections of the country, whether there is a shortage or not, the benefit of this revolving fund and the right to purchase seed where there is a shortage, and I am opposed to it. I think the amendment ought to be adopted, for I think we ought to put a limitation on the use of this fund. I do not believe it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. SLOAN. One word. You have "variety" there where you should have "kind" or "species."

Mr. GOOD. I ask to modify the amendment by putting in the word "kind" instead of "variety."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the amendment appears in the form of a proviso and a negation, it is, in point of fact, an affirmative statement, and, being affirmative, is legislation and subject to a point of order. As I caught the reading of the amendment, it provides that no part of this money shall be expended unless the Secretary shall find that there is a shortage. Now, the law under which the provision is made provides for the expenditure whenever in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture there may be a special need. This requires the Secretary to spend the money if there is a shortage, and whether there is any need or not.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman think there could be a need for seed if there was not a shortage?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, manifestly, yes. Although I am not a farmer, I can imagine that situation. There may not be a shortage of seed and yet a considerable shortage in the right kind of seed, and therefore a need to get the right kind of seed. And manifestly the question of need, ability to acquire, the seed within the time and at the place and locality, and the price, are the things which determine the Secretary's action, whereas the gentleman would want him to buy seed whenever there was a shortage of seed.

Mr. GOOD. I do not want to do anything in this regard that I think would in any way interfere with the proper administration of this law.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sure of that.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman knows, and I am sure will agree with me, that when we adopted this legislation and gave the Department of Agriculture a fund of $2,500,000 with which to purchase whenever in the opinion of the Secretary there was a bad need for it in any restricted area, and there was a shortage of seed of certain kinds, and in order to bring up our production to the highest possible point, the Secretary would thereby be enabled to furnish those particular areas with that kind of seed.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be true, but the point I am making, Mr. Chairman, is that while the language is disguised in the form of a limitation, in point of fact it is not a limitation but an enlargement.

Mr. GILLETT. It seems to me, if the gentleman will yield a moment——

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT (continuing). He seems to suggest compulsion. There is no compulsion.

Mr. SHERLEY. It permits it, and the law does not. The law only permits the Secretary to do it when he shall find a need. This permits him to do it whenever there is a shortage. There may be a shortage without a need.

Mr. GILLETT. And there may be a need without a shortage.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; but I am arguing the parliamentary law proposition.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GILLETT. As I understand it, the gentleman's argument is that the words "need" is smaller than the word "shortage" and embraces less.

Now, it seems to me it is clearly the other way. The law at present says that the Secretary shall do it if there is a need. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa provides that it shall only be done in case of a shortage, so that it seems to me it is clearly a limitation, because it does not strike out the present existence, but provides that—

No part of this fund shall be used for the purchase of seeds except in case the Secretary of Agriculture shall find there is a shortage of seed.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is just it. It requires the doing of an affirmative act by the Secretary before the money is expended. That is not a limitation in a negative sense.

Mr. GILLETT. The Secretary now is required by an affirmative act.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know; but what you are trying to do is, in an appropriation bill, under the guise of a negation, to require an affirmative action on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture, and that is not permitted.

Mr. GILLETT. Under the guise of a limitation.

Mr. SHERLEY. You have to have an actual negation and not simply, under the guise of "Provided," to carry an affirmative action.

Mr. GILLETT. It will be a limitation if it reduces.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is invoking the Holman rule with a limitation. This has nothing to do with the Holman rule. The rule is that a provision to be in order on an appropriation bill, changing the language, must be a limitation upon the power conferred. For instance, you can provide that where an appropriation was made for the purchase of a certain ship, "Provided, That it could not be expended for a ship of greater tonnage than a certain amount." That would be a limitation. But if you said, "Provided, That it shall not be expended until the Secretary of the Navy shall determine that a ship is of a certain tonnage," then you are legislating. It can be made in order, but it is not in order.

Mr. GILLETT. Now the Secretary of Agriculture can do it, provided there is a need. This says he shall do it provided there is a shortage.

Mr. SHERLEY. It says he shall not do it "except when he shall find," and so forth, which is an affirmative proposition

Mr. GILLETT. It can easily be said "except when there is a shortage."

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it intended in the language proposed that the discretion of the Secretary shall be enlarged or reduced?

Mr. GILLETT. Reduced.

Mr. SHERLEY. That operates, then, in changing existing law.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the act of August 10, 1917, which authorizes an appropriation of this kind, provides that "Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized," and so forth, requiring of the Secretary of Agriculture the affirmative determination of the needs of the various localities with regard to seed for food and forage crops or anything of that kind.

Now, take the case in a certain community; there may be an ample supply of seed. There may be no shortage at all. Yet John Jones may need some that he does not possess. In that case the Secretary of Agriculture can go into a community and buy for John Jones 100 bushels of oats and turn them over to him, when in that very community there is no shortage at all.

The amendment which I offered simply provides that it shall not be used except where the Secretary of Agriculture shall find there is a shortage. How can the Secretary of Agriculture determine the needs of a man unless he determines whether or not there is a shortage in this or that man's oat or corn bin? If he has more corn than he can plant and otherwise use, he does not need it, does he? And so in the determination of the very things provided for by law are the things he must determine under my amendment. He must determine whether or not there is a shortage in every man's crib. If that is not true, then I do not understand the English language.

Clearly, Mr. Chairman, the amendment is a limitation on this appropriation. I do not care to take up the time of the House, because if it is thought that I am asking the Secretary of Agriculture to do something in addition to what he is authorized to do, I will offer an amendment in another way and remove, so far as I can, that objection. I do not think it subject to a point of order, and I do not now think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. I believe the point of order should be sustained. I believe the amendment is clearly subject to a point of order, because it is new legislation, for if enacted it would completely nullify the provision of section 3 of the act of August 10, 1917, which provides:

That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or feed crops he is authorized to purchase or contract with persons who grow such seeds to store them and to furnish them to farmers for cash, at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation.

If this amendment, which limits the right of the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase when there is a shortage of a particular kind of seed, were enacted, then in the case of the oat crop, if there was a larger production of oats in the country than there was the year prior, or whatever year the comparison is to be made with—and that is not clear in the amendment—then the Secretary of Agriculture would have no right to purchase any oats, although there might be a large need for seed oats in some restricted districts of the country. The object of section 3 of the act of August 10, 1917, was to permit the Secretary to purchase kinds of seed of which there may be a surplus or a shortage grown and to have these seeds supplied to restricted area where there was a failure or shortage of crops last year and where a supply of the seeds is needed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Just for information, I want to inquire as to the words, "which may be used as a revolving fund." Is that in the present law?

Mr. NORTON. No.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then I do not see the application of the Holman rule. How can this be added without considering the Holman rule, I can not understand.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The Holman rule requires a limitation.

Mr. NORTON. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] would clearly change this provision of the present law and that, accordingly, the amendment is subject to the point of order that it is new legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. GOOD. The whole provision is subject to a point of order, and being subject to a point of order, this amendment can not be. We are amending the law here, making this a revolving fund.

Mr. SHERLEY. Where are we amending the law?

Mr. GOOD. My attention was just called to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be so, but it does not make it so.

Mr. GOOD. The language is, "Which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918."

Mr. SHERLEY. The law permits it. We are not changing the law.

Mr. GOOD. Where does the law provide that? The law does not provide for that at all. Section 3 says nothing about a revolving fund. The whole provision is subject to a point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. We have the right to appropriate for the seed, and to reappropriate up to June 30 on a deficiency bill.

Mr. GOOD. But you make it a revolving fund.

Mr. SHERLEY. We do; but that is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. GOOD. But it is legislation, is it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I think not.

Mr. GOOD. What was it put in for if it does not give additional power? The gentleman well knows that when the money came back into the Treasury for the sale of 100,000 bushels of corn, it could not be paid out again——

Mr. SHERLEY. Unless we appropriated it.

Mr. GOOD. Unless we appropriated it.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman assumes that we have no right to appropriate for its use and reuse up to July 1.

Mr. GOOD. I think you are legislating when you make it a revolving fund.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not care to delay the bill. I really do not care what is done with the point of order. I will deal with the merits of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. A new question is raised in this connection. Of course, it must be apparent that if the paragraph proposed to be amended is itself subject to a point of order, then no point of order will lie against the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. The language of the present paragraph, that is the original law, to the extent that it makes this a revolving fund—does that make the paragraph of the bill itself subject to a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was just going to say that a new suggestion is introduced, that the paragraph itself to which the amendment is proposed is subject to a point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair please, the very act itself provides for a revolving fund of two and a half million dollars up to June 30, and that is all we do.

Mr. GOOD. But here we are appropriating $34,000,000 and making that available.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the deficiency phase of it that makes it in order on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is the section to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. SHERLEY. The second paragraph of section 8 on page 2 of the act approved August 10, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is the language cited by the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SHERLEY. The language is—

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 3 of this act, $2,500,000, and this fund may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918.

If we have the right to appropriate it up to July 1 we have the right to appropriate for its reuse up to July 1. There is no limit under section 3 as to the amount that can be appropriated. The fact that we reappropriate it, but limit it always to July 1, keeps it within the rule.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Kentucky is right in that regard. I have examined the act, and I do not believe that anything can be claimed in regard to that matter; but I still insist that the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment and to offer one which I think will be unobjectionable.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send his amendment to the desk to be reported?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 76, line 4, after the word "eighteen," insert the following: "Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for the purchase of seed of any kind except where there is a shortage of seed of such kind in the respective districts."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not raise a point of order, but I want to be heard on the merits of the proposition.

The committee had from the Secretary of Agriculture a very full statement touching what was proposed to be done with the moneys that he had obtained and that he hopes to obtain. Perhaps there were some matters which we did not cover that we might have covered, but I submit to this House that not even as good a farmer as the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is in a position to know as well as the Secretary of Agriculture what the need is. Now, there may be, and frequently will be, cases in which there is need to supply seeds where there is not a shortage, because the determination of a shortage is a determination of the entire quantity of seeds over the country at large, whereas the determination of the need is by the act itself limited to restricted areas, and it is easily conceivable, and in point of fact is true, that there are places where there is great need, and yet there is no shortage in the kind of seeds. Take corn, for instance. There is great need of a certain character of corn to be had for planting in certain areas, but there is no shortage of corn for planting. You can find enough corn to plant. You might not find the kind of corn desired. But after all, laying aside those matters, what is the use of this House undertaking to quibble about this language? In the last analysis you have got to trust the intelligence and the patriotism and the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture and those who act under him, and it is folly to undertake to put language in here that may simply serve to hamper him, and which can not make a wise man out of him.

Mr. NORTON. Nobody questions his patriotism.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not simply a question of patriotism, but it is a question of judgment. How are you by legislation going to give wisdom to men? If the Secretary of Agriculture has not wisdom enough to expend this money without this limitation he has not wisdom enough to spend it with the limitation, and everybody here knows that is the fact.

Now, the committee has tried to take a reasonable course between the extremes of this House, between men who wanted us to furnish seed free or to furnish it on credit, which would amount in many instances to furnishing it free, and some gentlemen who seem to object to seed being furnished because some of the seed is of a certain character and going to certain sections of the country. There is nothing in the appropriation that restricts the Secretary and compels him to buy peanuts. The plan as outlined is a tentative plan based upon information that the department has. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] says there is no need for oats. I submit that the Secretary of Agriculture would not have submitted the table he has, touching the need of oats for planting, unless there was an actual need, and he is in a position to know more about it than the gentleman from Iowa. I say that with all proper respect for him. Now, let this committee be sensible in the legislation that we pass. We properly could determine questions of amount. The gentleman does not seek to limit the amount of money, but he seeks to put a limitation on the bill that will either be meaningless or will serve to handicap the Secretary in ways that can not now be foreseen, and that ought not to be adopted by the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised at one argument made by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who is one of the most logical, if not the most logical, gentlemen in the House. He says that we ought to trust to the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture to make proper expenditures in this line, to give the Secretary authority to use this money wherever he will. If we followed that line of argument everywhere, we would not make anything but lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. SHERLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I never said anything of the kind. There are limitations in the law, but the limitation the gentleman is trying to put on has no basis in reason.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not inclined to agree with my friend on that point any more than I am on the other. Now, take the matter of oats. My colleague [Mr. GOOD] has shown that we have an abundance of oats in the country of the finest quality. There is no need of this appropriation unless there is actual shortage of seeds, and, as I say, there is an abundance of that seed in this country.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Take an area of 20,000 square miles in Montana and Wyoming. There was not a bushel of oats raised in that section last year. Although there is a surplus in the country, might not there be an urgent need of oats in that restricted district?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In one sense there might; but the farmers in my district need money. I need money myself. A Member at my side asks, "How much?" More than I get. But I know of no reason why the Treasury should supply that need.

Mr. NORTON. The trouble is that it is impossible for these people to get the seed there.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That ought to be taken care of in a different way. As far as that is concerned, it comes back to the same point. Here are farmers that need money; that is what they need instead of seed. The gentleman from Dakota says that that ought to be supplied out of the Treasury, and the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky comes to the same thing.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, he knows that the law provides that seeds shall be sold for cash, and the amendment provides that the seed shall not be supplied if there happens to be in the country at large enough seed for the needs of the country. One of the difficulties that exists to-day is getting the seed in time to certain localities, and the kind of seed needed, irrespective of the shortage or supply of the country at large.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I know something about the oats business, because I come from a section where they raise an enormous amount of them. I am very familiar with that subject, being from an agricultural section. I know there is plenty of good seed oats, if people have the cash to buy it.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. Might there not be in the locality mentioned by the gentleman from North Dakota a shortage of seed in that locality, and would it not be within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to supply that shortage under the terms of the amendment offered?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If there was a genuine shortage, it could be supplied under the terms of the amendment.

Mr. NORTON. The amendment does not provide for a shortage in any particular district; it says a shortage of that kind of seed.

Mr. TOWNER. That is true, but it would apply under the general terms of the act in a particular locality. It does not say a general shortage all over the country. If there is a shortage or need in any particular locality, it would authorize him to supply the shortage under the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. NORTON. I would not so interpret it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We can not, Mr. Chairman, trust these matters to the judgment of any man, except where we are compelled by war's emergencies. Especially is this true when reason and our own judgment point out limitations which should prevail. I hope the amendment of my colleague will be adopted.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, returning to the gentleman from Iowa the bouquet handed by him to the gentleman from Kentucky, and which he is entitled to, for there is no more logical gentleman on the floor of the House ordinarily, I do not catch the logic of the argument he just made. Of course somewhere in the country there are seeds; otherwise we would be in a very bad way, indeed.

This appropriation was originally made on the theory that there was not a proper distribution of seed; that there were large areas in which seed had not been grown and where seed was difficult to secure, and we loaned the credit of the Federal Government to the farmers for the purpose of securing seeds where seeds could be obtained and transporting them and selling them to the farmers where they were not to be had. That is the purpose of the legislation. Whether it was wise or necessary to do that is a matter of opinion.

But we assumed that it was necessary to do it, or we would not have done that thing. Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], if I understand his amendment at all, would prevent the purchase and sale of seed if anywhere in the country there were seeds obtainable. He speaks about oats. Of course every farmer in Iowa ought every year to come to Wyoming or Montana to buy his seed in order to get good oats; not the light, fluffy stuff that grows down there, that a whiff of wind will carry beyond the barnyard out into the field. Our purpose of this legislation is to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to go into the regions where they really grow good solid oats that weigh 38 to 42 pounds to the struck bushel and take them into Iowa, where, I am told, they frequently grow oats that weigh about 20 or 25 pounds to the heaped bushel.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman's statement regarding conditions in Iowa can——

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, well, I will make it Indiana; I do not see anyone from Indiana present. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman's statement is a sufficient explanation.

Mr. MONDELL. I know that the gentleman from Iowa does not want to hamper the Secretary in utilizing this fund. It may be that the Secretary has not made as wise a distribution as we think he should have made of the money, but we hope in that case that the fault will be rectified under the new appropriation.

This ought to be amended so as to allow the Secretary to sell this seed to organizations that will guarantee the repayment of the money. That is what we ought to do, but if we are not to do that we at least should not hamper the Secretary. We ought to enable him to go into the regions where there are good seeds, where they are plentiful. For instance, as I said a moment ago, go into the mountainous part of Wyoming and get his oat seed.

Mr. GOOD. Can he get oats there now?

Mr. MONDELL. In some parts of that country they are short. We want a better distribution of them, and that is what is proposed under this bill. I am sure that any limitation would hamper the Secretary and would not secure the distribution that ought to be had.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the point of order been made?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I should like to have five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, we have already had an hour upon this.

Mr. GOOD. I have not had any time on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all other amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then I move that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. SHERLEY. That gives the gentleman five minutes for his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I would not like to be restricted in that way. Give me 10 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said about the logic of the statements of the gentlemen who have discussed this amendment. Permit me now to call the attention of the committee to the logic of the amendment. The amendment is as follows:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for the purchase of seed of any kind except where there is a shortage of seed of such kind.

That is, no part of this sum can be used to purchase any seed in any place except where there is a shortage of seed. It seems to me the place to purchase seed by the Secretary of Agriculture would be a place where there is a surplus of seed rather than where there is a shortage. This amendment precludes him from purchasing any seed except in some place where he can find there is a shortage of seed of that particular kind. If that is logic in the amendment the committee can make the most of such logic by voting down the amendment. It is simply ridiculous as it now stands. What the gentleman who proposed the amendment probably wishes to accomplish is to provide that the seed shall only be allowed to be purchased by the Secretary of Agriculture when there is a shortage in certain restricted districts. The amendment as it now stands would preclude the Secretary from purchasing seed except in a place where there was a shortage of seed. As the amendment stands, of course it can not be and should not be accepted by the committee. If the amendment were to the affect that the provision should limit the Secretary to purchasing seed when there is a shortage, that should not be adopted unless it should limit the Secretary to purchasing seeds and supplying them when there is a shortage in a particular restricted district. That is exactly what the provision as it is in the bill would allow. It allows the Secretary to purchase the seed and to supply it where there is a need for it. The amendment should be defeated.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask to modify the amendment by adding in the words "in any restricted area," so that it will obviate all the objection made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. I do not wish to do a thing that will hamper or embarrass the Department of Agriculture. I have high regard for the Secretary of Agriculture, but I want to say that no Secretary of Agriculture could go into the details of administration of a fund of this kind, and the hearings show that the Secretary in administration of the fund relied upon some of the bureau chiefs with regard to all of these matters, and some of these bureau chiefs differed from him very materially in some of the matters that came before the committee. It is estimated here to use $750,000 with which to buy seed oats, and if the Secretary investigates the matter he will find that there is no shortage of seed oats. When this estimate was made it was made upon the basis of a dollar a bushel, when the market price of oats in Chicago at that time was about 54 cents. Does anyone think that the farmers of North Dakota or Montana are foolish enough to pay a dollar a bushel, the amount required here by this bill and the amount which the Secretary paid for oats when oats were selling for between 50 and 60 cents in the open market?

I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the amendment offered by Mr. GOOD, add the following: "in any restricted area," so that it will read:

"Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for the purchase of seed of any kind except where there is a shortage of seed of such kind in any restricted area."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

Page 76, strike out the period after the word "eighteen" and insert a semicolon and the following:

"Provided, That no portion of the amount herein appropriated shall be used except when seeds purchased thereby shall be sold to farmers upon credit."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, as the point of order is reserved, I shall first make a few remarks with the idea that the amendment offered is in order. I do not think there is any question but that the amendment is in order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman realizes that his time is running.

Mr. MORGAN. I am to have 10 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I thought the gentleman was undertaking to discuss the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. I want time in which to discuss the point of order also.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then the gentleman would have 10 minutes additional. I am not willing that he should do that. I am willing to reserve the point of order for 10 minutes in order that he may discuss the merits of the proposition if he desires.

Mr. MORGAN. All right, thank you.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes and under the unanimous-consent agreement will occupy 10 minutes in the discussion of both the point of order and the merits of the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. This provision in this bill appropriates $4,000,000. Under the so-called food-control act these funds must be used in selling seeds to farmers for cash. First, I wish to address a few words to the chairman in a discussion of the point of order. My amendment does not limit the amount of money expended, but does limit the purpose for which it may be used. In other words, under my amendment no portion of this $4,000,000 can be used except in selling seeds to farmers on credit. Now, the fact that my amendment may change the existing law does not make it subject to the point of order. For instance, I will read here from Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, page 630:

The question arose as to whether this is a limitation merely. If so, the amendment is in order. If not, it is out of order. It is maintained that this amendment changes existing law. In a sense every limitation changes existing law. If any specific condition is mentioned under which an appropriation is to be withheld, that is, pro tanto, a change of existing law, at least to the extent that the whole or a part of the appropriation can not be expended unless the condition is complied with.

Now, then, under my amendment not one single cent of this $4,000,000 can be used unless it is used to sell seeds to farmers on credit. The entire $4,000,000 might be saved to the Government. My amendment restricts or limits the use of money. Hence it is in order as a limitation. That has been ruled in many cases.

My amendment provides that no portion of the $4,000,000 appropriated under this paragraph shall be used except that which is used in the purchase of seeds to sell to the farmers on credit. This is clearly a limitation of the use of the money appropriated, and hence it is a limitation which is in order as an amendment to an appropriation bill. It may be said that my amendment changes existing law, and is therefore out of order. But I have quoted a decision from Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, page 639, which clearly points out the fact that every limitation changes existing law. My amendment is therefore not objectionable on the ground that it changes existing law. There are many authorities which might be cited sustaining my view of the proposition.

Assuming, therefore, that my amendment is not subject to a point of order, I wish to discuss somewhat the merits of my amendment. It is well to have in mind the history of this question. It came up when the food-survey bill was before Congress during the last session.

House bill 4188, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, became a law August 10, 1917, and as introduced by Mr. Lever and as it passed the House, contained in section 4 of said bill the following paragraph:

That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds, suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized to purchase, grow, or otherwise procure such seed, to store them, and to furnish them, by sale or otherwise, to farmers on credit or other terms at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation.

The foregoing provision did not become a law. The provision was modified in the Senate as is found in the act which became a law in section 3 thereof, which is as follows:

That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds, suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized to purchase or contract with persons to grow such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them to farmers for cash, at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation.

For myself I was greatly disappointed that the Senate amended this bill limiting the Secretary of Agriculture in furnishing seed for farmers to sell for cash only. That, in my judgment, was a very grave mistake. I thought so then. Time has confirmed my original view.

The object of the law is expressed in its title, "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products. The food-control act, which was a companion measure to the food-survey act, was "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel." No one can read the titles to these bills without being impressed with the idea that one of the chief purposes of these bills was to stimulate and encourage the production of food products. This could be accomplished chiefly by two ways, namely, by increasing the acreage planted and by enlarging the yield per acre. In sections of the country where the farmers have had good crops there would be no demand for the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish seed to the farmers, either for cash or on credit. But it would be altogether different in any section of the country where there had been a failure of crops and where the farmers would not have the seed nor the cash to pay therefor, and could not command the credit necessary to purchase a sufficient amount of seed.

When the food-control bill was before the House I sought to have it amended so as to provide an ample fund to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish the farmer seeds on credit. With this in view, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 22, 1917, page 4426, temporary binding, I offered the following amendment:

That, as a further means of stimulating the production of necessaries, the President, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to loan to the farmers of the United States, through such governmental agencies as he shall direct, a sum of money not to exceed $50,000,000, upon such terms, conditions, and security, and at such rates of interest, as he shall prescribe, and which, in his judgment, shall be necessary to assure an adequate supply thereof, and the sum of $50,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be available immediately.

That amendment was ruled out of order. Whether that ruling was correct or not, it was certainly unfortunate that some provision was not made, either in the food-survey bill or in the food-control bill, whereby the farmers of the United States in drouth-stricken regions could not have been furnished seeds on credit at a low rate of interest.

It should be borne in mind that the Secretary of Agriculture already has a fund of $2,500,000 which he may use as a revolving fund in furnishing seeds to farmers for cash. This would appear to be ample capital for use of the Secretary of Agriculture so long as he does a seed business on a cash basis. I doubt the advisability of increasing the capital for this purpose when it appears to be ample already.

Furthermore, to increase the appropriation of funds to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in selling seeds to the farmers for cash seems to be a species of deception to the farmers of the country. The word has gone forth that the appropriation to aid the farmers in purchasing seed is to be increased from $2,500,000 to $6,500,000. This is held out as a great favor to the farmers. But I do not so regard it. A farmer who can pay the Secretary of Agriculture cash for seed can pay cash to any dealer or any owner for such seeds. The poor farmer who has neither cash nor credit can not deal with the Secretary of Agriculture. The rich farmer, who has the cash, or who has credit, can purchase his seed from the Secretary of Agriculture. We are therefore helping the farmers who need no help, and we are refusing aid to those who need it. This is a wrong principle.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand the gentleman wants to strike out this appropriation?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; not if I can get it properly amended; but I do not regard it of much value to the farmers or as a means of increasing food production. I do not want to be severe, but I look upon this proposition to sell seeds to farmers for cash as a proposition wholly without merit. When we sell for cash, we are doing no more than any dealer will do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, does not the gentleman know it is not sold for cash alone but also at cost. That is not what the profiteer would do. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN. Well, there might be a slight advantage there, but the advantage will go only to rich and well-to-do farmers who do not need it. More than that, the Secretary must go into the market and buy his seeds from dealers; he must pay the market price; dealers can buy them as cheap as he can. The farmers will save little through purchasing from the Secretary.

I do not want to be critical, but, in my honest judgment, this provision is worthless to the farmers of the United States. Now, I think my amendment is in order. If it is adopted it would perhaps save all of this $4,000,000, and it should be saved unless it can be used in some way that would benefit the farmers of the United States, who need the help, not the rich farmers, not the farmers who have the cash to pay, but the farmers who are poor and needy. Last season out in western Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma the farmers wanted seed wheat. Their wheat had been a failure. They had no seed. They had no money. The local banks had not the means to finance them. Seeding a wheat crop is an expensive proposition. The Secretary of Agriculture could not help them. He could sell only for cash. For months our farmers were appealing for help. So to-day, in the spring-wheat States, the farmers in many localities have not the cash to buy seed wheat. We know the need of an increased production of wheat in 1918. But the National Government refuses to help these farmers to secure seed on credit. It is a mistake. It is poor policy. If the farmers of the winter-wheat States could have purchased seed wheat on credit last fall, millions of additional acres of wheat would now be growing in the fields. If the Federal Government will now furnish the farmers in the spring-wheat States seed wheat on terms or credit, the acreage in wheat will be largely increased and millions of additional bushels of wheat will be produced.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL offers the following amendment: Page 76, line 3, after the comma, strike out the figures "$4,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,999,000, and the seeds purchased hereunder may be sold for cash at cost or on credit with approved security of responsible organization guaranteeing repayment and assuming the expense of distributing the seeds amongst the farmers."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order. I am opposed to the amendment; but a few minutes ago, when this act of August 10, 1917, was discussed, I find I was in error when I made the statement that the provisions of this appropriation, providing that it shall be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918, were in order. Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will look at the act——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, all debate except on the point of order is ended.

Mr. GOOD. I am talking about the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, all right. I did not so understand the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. The act of August 10, 1917, provides in section 3 that—

Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seed suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized to contract with persons to grow such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them to farmers for cash, at a cost including the expense of packing and transportation.

That ends the provision so far as the permanent law is concerned. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] referred to section 8 of the same act, but section 8 was an appropriation and enlarged the provision of law found in section 3. It enlarged the provisions of section 3 and it died with that provision. Is it possible that if this Congress should pass an appropriation unauthorized, or add to an appropriation and use language by which we enlarged existing law, that in all succeeding Congresses it would be in order to offer appropriations carrying the enlarged provisions? Nowhere in the permanent law is there a provision for a revolving fund, but when the Congress considered that appropriation later on it added to the provisions of section 3. So when we put in this provision, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918, we did enlarge upon the provisions of the act to which I have referred. The provisions, so far as they refer to that act, were only for that fund and for no other fund, for that specific appropriation, and that appropriation went further than the provisions of the law giving the Secretary of Agriculture the right to create this fund and to purchase these seeds. I suggest, therefore, to the Chair that the whole provision that we have been discussing is subject to a point of order and, being subject to a point of order and the point not having been made, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming is in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the argument made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is sound; but, further, the amendment is not subject to a point of order, because it comes clearly under the Holman rule. I offered an amendment a short time ago which came under the Holman rule, under some rather extreme decisions that have been rendered under that rule, decisions that I have not approved, but decisions which would have warranted a favorable decision on the amendment I then offered. I did not urge them because I think there is danger of going far afield under the Holman rule. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] objected to that amendment, because while I did reduce the amount carried in the bill the additional language did not relate directly to the reduction and did not of itself retrench expenditure.

Now, if the chairman will listen to me, I will point out to him the difference between that amendment and this one.

This amendment comes under the Holman rule, first, because it actually reduces the amount of money in this bill; second, because it reduces expenditures under the bill by providing that when these seeds are sold on credit they are to be upon the security of organizations that guarantee the repayment and bear the expense of distributing the seeds. Clearly my amendment not only reduces the amount of money carried in the bill, but it would further retrench expenditures whenever the seeds were sold on credit. If the seeds are sold for cash, matters would stand as they now do in the bill; but if they were sold on credit there would be a retrenchment of expenditures, because the department would be relieved of the expense of distributing the seeds. The organizations I have in mind and have proposed are organizations in the county seats, let us say, of the counties, of farmers and bankers, of stockmen and business men, who guarantee repayment, and who themselves take the responsibility of seeing that the seeds are distributed.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If no provision was made for the seeds to be sold on credit and there could be no retrenchments?

Mr. MONDELL. If no——

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, your amendment provides only for retrenchment in case they are sold on credit?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. That part of my amendment which reduces the amount brings it under the Holman rule. The balance follows and is connected with it and in itself reduces expenditures.

As a matter of fact, the amendment as I offered it would be in order if it did not reduce the appropriation carried in the bill a dollar, because the additional provision in itself would retrench expenditures by providing that if these seeds were sold on credit they must be sold on the credit of an organization which would distribute the seeds. That would reduce expenditures by shifting the work of distribution of the seeds. It is clearly not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard?

Mr. SHERLEY. Just a word. There are two positions taken by the two distinguished gentlemen. One is that the original paragraph being subject to a point of order, and no point of order having been made against it, any amendment germane to it is in order. The answer to that is a denial of the premises, and I deny that the original proposition as contained in the bill is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not take that attitude.

Mr. SHERLEY. The language of the law on which all of this is based is found not only in paragraph 3, but in the so-called food-survey law in its entirety. In section 8 there is a provision carrying $2,500,000 as a revolving fund for the fiscal year 1918.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa temporarily forgot that this is a deficiency bill to supply additional money where moneys already supplied are not sufficient. To say that where $2,500,000 were supplied as a revolving fund for this purpose it would not be in order to increase for the same purpose as a revolving sum that amount is simply to say that no deficiency is in order on a deficiency bill.

Now, touching the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. Then, following that line of argument, I suppose the gentleman would say that the words of the provision here which provides for a revolving fund are surplusage, and the money can be used as a revolving fund as a deficiency under that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Whether surplusage or not, they do not change or enlarge the scope of the previous appropriation at all.

Now, touching the point made by the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the language of his amendment is this: He reduces the appropriation by $1,000 instead of $1, and then provides that "the seed purchased hereunder may be sold for cash at cost or on credit with approved security of responsible organizations guaranteeing repayment and assuming the expense of distributing the seeds among the farmers," and then he makes this assumption, that inasmuch as he provides for securing the value of the seeds that are sold on credit, he is thereby safeguarding the Treasury. That would be true if——

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. That would be true if we were now going to sell on credit without any safeguarding, but in point of fact we are not going to sell on credit at all. The mistake which the gentleman falls into is in assuming that the reduction of an appropriation in any amount is sufficient to enable you to put in any legislative provision you want under the Holman rule, whereas, as I stated a while ago to another occupant of the Chair on another amendment offered by the gentleman, this is the real rule and should be borne in mind, that to come within the Holman rule the language which is submitted and which is a change of existing law must of itself be such as to result in a reduction of expenditure.

Mr. MONDELL. And that is exactly what my amendment does.

Mr. SHERLEY. No. The reduction of expenditures comes by virtue of reducing the amount, but not by virtue of the legislation you tack on afterwards, and that is a distinction that is as wide as a barn door.

Mr. MONDELL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is exactly what it does do. There is to be no loan unless there is to be a saving to the Treasury through distribution by the organizations that guarantee the loans. Surely there is a saving there.

Mr. SHERLEY. No. The saving that comes to the Treasury, if any, comes—and, of course, in point of fact, there would not be—but assuming that——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman would not say that the distribution of the seeds would not cost the Government anything?

Mr. SHERLEY. Under the paragraph as originally presented $4,000,000 was appropriated. Under it as proposed by the gentleman there is to be $3,999,000 appropriated. That is the extent of the saving. All your limitation after that has nothing to do with the saving.

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will allow me, the item would be in order, in my opinion, if there was not a reduction in the amount of the appropriation, because of itself it contemplates a retrenchment in expenditures. The law now provides for the sale of these seeds for cash. There is a change of law authorizing their sale on credit, and providing they are sold on credit with the security of organizations that not only guarantee the return of the money, but assume all of the expense of distributing the seed. In other words instead of the Secretary going to the expense of distributing $10,000 worth of seed among 500 farmers, this association assumes all that cost. There is a retrenchment, clearly a retrenchment. We have organizations in our country that do that very thing. They guarantee the repayment from the farmers, distribute the seeds among them, and collect the money.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commercial attachés. To enable the Secretary of Commerce, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances during the balance of the present fiscal year by way of additional compensation to officers and employees of the commercial attaché service, in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $9,000.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how many commercial attachés we have?

Mr. SHERLEY. There are 11, I think.

Mr. FLOOD. What salaries do they get?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the distinguished gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, know?

Mr. SHERLEY. The one at Buenos Aires gets $8,000; the one at Copenhagen, $5,000; at Lima, $4,500; London, $5,000; Melbourne, $4,500; Paris, $5,000; Petrograd, $6,000; Peking, $6,000; Rio de Janeiro, $5,000; Tokio, $5,000; The Hague, $3,500.

Mr. FLOOD. I suppose this item is to supplement the salary of those 11 officers.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is to do for these men exactly what we did for the gentlemen attached to the diplomatic and consular offices of the Government abroad, after consulting with the representatives of those departments.

Mr. FLOOD. I think it is very proper, owing to the increased cost of living and the high price of exchange, to make this allowance, and I shall not make the point of order, though the item is subject to a point of order, as the gentleman from Kentucky will admit. But I do not think that these attachés ought to be under the supervision and control of the Department of Commerce. It results in a duplication of work and in a lessening of the value that these attachés would otherwise be to the commerce of this country. At the proper time I want to make a suggestion to the House with reference to this matter and show that our entire foreign service should be under one department of the Government, and that the State Department, the branch of our Government through which the United States speaks in its relations with other governments.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. Has the gentleman any information as to how the salaries of the State Department officers with respect to post allowances compare with the salaries of these commercial attachés, as just read by the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know, because I do not know what post allowances were given to the Department of Commerce for the benefit of these attachés for the other part of this year; that is, the part of the fiscal year other than that which is to run between now and the 1st of July. Can the gentleman from Kentucky tell us if this is the first post allowance that they have had?

Mr. SHERLEY. This is the first allowance that has been made to these commercial attachés.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think it would be as large a per cent as the Diplomatic and Consular representatives received under the post-allowance fund of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it not probably true that the salaries of these commercial attachés are higher than the salaries of the officers in the State Department, whom the State Department think it is necessary to aid by giving them a post allowance?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, yes; very much higher. I do not think there are any diplomatic and consular officers who get this post allowance who have as large salaries as some of these commercial attachés.

Mr. SHERLEY. There are 10 clerks in addition to these 11 attachés.

Mr. FLOOD. They get $1,500 a year.

Mr. ROGERS. Is this $9,000 apportioned among the clerks as well as the attachés?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is as I understand it.

Mr. ROGERS. The appropriation for the force of commercial attachés is $100,000, is it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that is correct.

Mr. FLOOD. It is $100,000.

Mr. ROGERS. Is a portion of that sum expended for expenses of the officers themselves?

Mr. SHERLEY. For office rent, traveling expenses, and so forth.

Mr. ROGERS. But not for living expenses in any case?

Mr. SHERLEY. No, sir.

Mr. FLOOD. These attachés should be a part of our foreign service under the jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of State. This has been so ever since they were created and is more so now than ever, and will become more so than now after the war is over and our tremendously developed commercial interests have to be fostered and protected.

Here are 11 foreign agents, and there should be more of them, who should be the commercial experts of our embassies and legations and important advisers of the Secretary of State, owing their appointments and making their reports, without any reference to the embassies and legations or the Secretary of State, but to a department of the Government which should confine its activities to our domestic commerce.

The war has changed the entire nature of the functions to be performed by the Department of State and the Department of Commerce in relation to foreign trade and brought it back to what it was intended to be by the founders of our Government.

Owing to the necessarily close relationship between the commercial and political questions involved in international trade few transactions of importance in a governmental way are concluded independently of the direct or indirect aid of the Department of State.

The entire export and import trade of the country is under the control of the War Trade Board, the chairman of which, the Hon. Vance C. McCormick, is the representative of the Secretary of State on that board.

The action of that body is creating day by day conditions that must be dealt with by the Department of State through the diplomatic corps in Washington and through our embassies, legations, and consulates abroad. The most important and necessary treatment of these questions is diplomatic and a function of the State Department, and can not be otherwise. Anyone who has any dealings with these matters must understand this.

It is generally conceded that the free play of economic forces after the war will lead to economic disturbances and in many places to economic failure. These conditions will apply to foreign countries all over the world and will call for the intervention of the Department of State and under its direction of the diplomatic and consular offices in foreign countries.

The problems of international commerce have ceased to be, and will probably not again for many years be primarily functions of a domestic department of the Government. Each and everyone will henceforth, as it is now, be interwoven with the political relations of the United States with foreign nations.

It seems important, therefore, first, that the Department of State should be enlarged to meet the requirements of the changed conditions, and to make it possible to give adequate and intelligent attention to the political interests of the United States in future international relations and to the problems of individual Americans, and to give adequate and expert attention to all commercial questions having a political bearing.

We already have an administrative organization in the department, and political divisions, charged with the duty of studying and dealing with the political relations of the United States and foreign nations, but we have not a sufficient provision for handling the commercial functions with which that department will of necessity be charged after the war ends. This provision should be made and this need supplied. We should begin by transferring these attachés to the Department of State and coordinating all of our foreign activities.

Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Great Britain have been for months making careful preparations for trade after the war. In Great Britain several officers are studying Austria, others are studying the Balkan States and the Ottoman Empire, Italy, Russia, and other States in the most exhaustive manner.

The United States should act promptly in this matter through the State Department under its Bureau of Trade Advisors, to which end it should greatly increase and enlarge this bureau, and enable it to do this work so that America and Americans will not neglect the opportunities that will come to us after the war.

Second, the foreign agents of the United States must be placed under the control of the department of Government through which the United States speaks in its relations with other nations.

We have heretofore had a body of agents abroad representing various departments—Treasury, War, Navy, Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor. The agents of the War, Navy, and Labor Departments have been attached to, and, in most cases, have not conflicted with, the embassies, legations, and consulates. The agents of the Treasury and Agriculture have, as a rule, not been attached to diplomatic and consular offices, and the results have not, as I am informed, been very satisfactory.

The commercial attachés of the Department of Commerce, while attached to the embassies and legations, have of necessity had to deal with subjects which were interwoven with the daily work of the embassies and legations, and conflicts of jurisdiction and opinion have been unavoidable. I believe they have resulted in confusion and trouble; overlapping of functions, and duplications of work have been frequent. I learn that attachés have often been engaged upon work which might better have been done by consuls, when other work of the embassies of the highest commercial importance remained undone because of the lack of control of the attaché on the part of the ambassador. On the other hand, attachés have sent home political reports not through the State Department, and of which, I presume, the Secretary of State had no knowledge.

A divided control of activity in the foreign field ought no longer be permitted, because successful relations, political and commercial, require concentrated, systematic effort, which can be secured by having only one directing force at home. This is the course followed by Great Britain, France, Japan, Germany, and other great commercial countries.

Each embassy, legation, and consulate should be made a center of activity not only for gathering information and administering American laws but also for making the local people understand the ideals, motives, abilities, and resources of the United States.

The commercial attaché should be the commercial expert of the embassy or legation dealing with matters of important commercial policy and tendency, the adviser of the ambassador on all commercial subjects, and the aid of the Secretary of State in averting governmental activities of a commercial nature unfavorable to the United States. No commercial attaché can be made of much value except he be made the spokesman of the ambassador, and no head of an embassy will assume responsibility for members of the embassy staff who are not under his own direction and that of the department of which he is a member.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Military research: To enable the Bureau of Standards to cooperate with the War and Navy Departments by providing the scientific assistance necessary in the development of instruments, devices, and materials, and the standardization and testing of supplies, including personal services and rental of quarters in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; the erection of temporary structures; books of reference and periodicals; and all other necessary items not included in the foregoing, $250,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the exceedingly valuable services that are being rendered by the Bureau of Standards. I think there is no other bureau of the Government that is now rendering any more valuable service to the Government in the war preparations than is the Bureau of Standards. It would not be possible for me now to take the time to call the attention of the House to the many ways in which the Bureau of Standards has been assisting in the war work. As an illustration, let me call attention to what they have been doing in aid of aero construction, the determination of standards and types, and the general work of preparing our air service. Their assistance has been exceedingly valuable in almost every stage of the work. In the developments and modifications that have been made of the liberty motor, and especially in the development of the materials that are to be used in the manufacture of aircraft, the Bureau of Standards has rendered invaluable service. It was supposed that mahogany was the only wood which could be used for the construction of propeller blades. By the work of the Bureau of Standards the fact has been developed that a good many of our native woods may be used, upon proper tests, so that we shall have no difficulty in finding within the confines of our own country all the necessary materials for that purpose. It was supposed that nothing except linen could be used for the covering of the wings. It has been determined by experiments made by the Bureau of Standards that cotton may be made almost, if not entirely, equal to linen for this purpose if properly prepared. So I might call attention to a great many things that the Bureau of Standards is doing.

If this appropriation is made, it will enable the Bureau of Standards to cooperate with the War and Navy Departments in their work in many regards.

Mr. Chairman, the whole subject of the bringing together of the various forces of the Government in our war work is, of course, now of pressing and vital importance. So many propositions have been placed before the people and before Congress for the reorganization of the various departments, for their consolidation, for the taking away from the President of his power as Chief Executive of the United States and as Commander in Chief of our Armies and Navies—a proposition which I think is absolutely unconstitutional—that this subject of the bringing together of the executive powers of the Nation and of all our industrial and productive forces to the prosecution of the war is, of course, primarily and immediately the great duty of Congress. That subject I desire to discuss somewhat in detail.

A WAR CABINET.

Mr. Chairman, the proposal to establish by act of Congress a superior war council or war cabinet to direct the war is so revolutionary and would effect such a radical departure from our present constitutional system as to demand most serious consideration. It is my belief, first, that the proposition in the form presented is unconstitutional; second, that it is unnecessary and unwise.

EXECUTIVE POWER OF THE PRESIDENT.

The Constitution provides, Article XI, section 1, paragraph 1:

The executive power shall be vested in a President.

The President is the sole possessor of what the Constitution describes as the executive power. Congress may confer upon heads of departments, upon Secretaries whom we denominate members of the President's Cabinet, certain administrative and executive duties, but these are recognized as being subordinate to the supreme power of the President, and are to be exercised under his direction and control.

Thus in the act of Congress establishing the War Department it is provided:

The Secretary of War shall perform such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined on or intrusted to him by the President relative to military commissions, the military forces, the warlike stores of the United States, or to other matters respecting military affairs; and he shall conduct the business of the department in such manner as the President shall direct.

In the act establishing the Department of the Navy it is provided:

The Secretary of the Navy shall execute such orders as he shall receive from the President relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, equipment, and employment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the Naval Establishment.

It will be observed that in these grants of power to the heads of departments Congress has been careful not to impinge in the slightest degree upon the supreme executive authority of the President. The Secretary of War shall perform such duties as the President shall intrust to him, and in the manner the President shall direct. The Secretary of the Navy shall execute such orders as he shall receive from the President.

The heads of the departments are thus made the assistants, the aids of the President. They are not granted original or plenary power. To the various departments are committed the several kinds of administrative activities. But Congress has never sought to divest the President of his supreme executive authority or to confer upon any individual, or department, or "Cabinet" any part of the constitutional executive prerogatives. Congress may say, and does say, that to a certain department shall be committed the consideration of a certain class of related administrative matters, and as the aid and assistant of the President, who is the sole source of the executive authority and the final arbiter of all executive controversies, the head of such department may exercise certain subordinate executive functions. But Congress has never sought to confer supreme or original executive authority upon any individual, or department, or "Cabinet."

Congress has created from time to time, as they were needed, the executive departments of the Government. It has transferred part of the functions of one department to another. It has taken parts from several existing departments and committed such parts to a new department which it created. All this is necessary and proper. Indeed, it is the accepted and orderly procedure, which has never been contested or challenged.

But the proposition now engaging public attention is far different. It assumes that Congress has the control and management of the executive functions of the Government, which the Constitution has committed to the President, and without changing the Constitution it proposes to divest the President of a large part of his executive authority and confer it upon a new body unknown to our Constitution and hitherto unknown to our laws. It also proposes to divest the President of his control of the heads of departments and confer such control upon the new "superior war cabinet."

The Constitution does not provide for a cabinet. It refers to "executive departments," and assigns duties to the "heads of departments." It also gives the President authority to require of these "heads of departments" "opinions in writing." Thus inferentially the Constitution recognizes the exercise of subordinate executive functions by the "heads of departments." But Executive authority is not conferred upon them. It is exercised in subordination to and under the direction of the President, upon whom alone all Executive power is conferred. The Constitution also recognized the advisory duties of the heads of departments, and in this capacity that they shall constitute what we term the President's Cabinet. But that in still larger measure is dependent on the President for its existence and activity. The heads of departments may or may not be the President's advisers. The President is not obliged to consult them. If he asks for their advice and they give it, he is not compelled to follow their advice. He may consult them when he desires so to do, and only then. He is compelled to hold no Cabinet meetings, and he may consult with any one or any number, or all of his Cabinet, as he shall determine. He is not limited to the members of the Cabinet for his advisers; he may consult with anyone he chooses, and he may act on such advice as against the advice of the entire Cabinet if he shall so determine.

The supremacy of the President in the exercise of Executive authority over any power that can be conferred by Congress on heads of departments or others has been many times upheld by the courts. Thus it was held in Wilcox v. Jackson (13 Pet., 498), that the President speaks and acts through the heads of departments in reference to the business committed to them. To the same effect is United States v. Cutler (2 Curt., C. Cls., 617); Lockington v. Smith (Pet., C. Cls., 466). Congress may impose independent duties upon heads of departments when not repugnant and only to the extent that they are not repugnant to the supreme executive authority conferred by the Constitution on the President. (Kendall v. United States, 12 Pet., 524.)

Cooley, in his great work on constitutional limitations, says:

There would be this clear limitation upon the power of the legislature to prescribe rules for the executive department; that they must not be such as under pretense of regulation divest the Executive of, or preclude his exercising any of his constitutional prerogatives or powers. Those matters which the Constitution specifically confides to him the legislature can not directly or indirectly take from his control.

It would be within the jurisdiction of Congress to withdraw powers already conferred upon the head of a department. It could confer upon any or all of them additional powers subordinate to the President. But it can not under the guise of coordinating executive powers grant to a body which it creates powers superior to the powers of the President or take from him any of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution.

POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT AS COMMANDER IN CHIEF.

The Constitution provides, Article XI, section 2, paragraph 1:

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

The directness and simplicity of this provision of the Constitution leaves nothing to speculation or conjecture. On the President is conferred all the powers of control and direction of both the Army and Navy. Congress may declare war, but the President wages war. Congress may "raise and support armies," it may "provide and maintain a navy," but it can not command them. The power of the President as supreme commander is independent and absolute.

Mr. Chief Justice Chase well and clearly expressed the line of demarcation between the powers of the President and of Congress in military affairs in Ex parte Milligan (4 Wall., 2):

Congress has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war. It has, therefore, the power to provide by law for carrying on war. This power necessarily extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution of war with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and duty belong to the President as Commander in Chief. The power to make the necessary laws is in Congress; the power to execute in the President. Both powers imply many subordinate and auxiliary powers. Each includes all authority essential to its due exercise. But neither can the President, in war more than in peace, intrude upon the proper authority of Congress nor Congress upon the proper authority of the President. Both are servants of the people, whose will is expressed in the fundamental law.

Mr. Willoughby, in his late work on the Constitution, says:

Through or under the orders of the President all military operations in times of peace as well as of war are conducted. He has within his control the disposition of troops, the direction of vessels of war, and the planning and execution of campaigns.

With Congress lies the authority to lay down the rules governing the organization and maintenance of the military forces, the determination of their number, the fixing of the manner in which they shall be armed and equipped, the establishment of forts, hospitals, arsenals, etc., and the voting of appropriations for all military purposes.

To the same effect speaks Von Holst in his work on constitutional law:

In war the entire technical direction of affairs is incumbent upon the President. Congress has only to decide whether there shall be war and what means it will grant the President with which to conduct the war; but how the war declared by Congress shall be conducted by the means granted by it is the exclusive affair of the President. Congress may criticize, may express wishes, may pass resolutions, but it can prescribe absolutely nothing to the President, even though his acts and omissions be fraught with political consequences of the most preeminent importance.

It was held in Swain v. United States (28 C. Cls., 173) that the constitutional power of the President to command the Army and Navy and that of Congress "to makes rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces" are distinct. Congress can not by rules and regulations impair the authority of the President as Commander in Chief.

SUPREME AUTHORITY CAN NOT BE GIVEN A WAR CABINET.

It is proposed and earnestly advocated in the press and elsewhere to establish a "superior war council," to which shall be committed the conduct of the war. It is to be above the Cabinet, and to it is to be committed much of the power of the President. There is need, it is said, of a central control in order to secure unity of action. To secure this the control now vested in the President and his Cabinet is to be transferred to the new "war cabinet," and the President is to be "relieved" of most of his powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Legislation is proposed to create a "war cabinet" to be composed of "three distinguished citizens of demonstrated executive ability." This "war cabinet" shall have authority to "consider, devise, and formulate plans and policies, general and special, for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the war." It is also given authority "to direct and procure the execution of the same." It is also given power to "direct and control" all "executive departments, officials, and agencies of the Government" in so far as may be necessary, in its judgment, "for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war." By this simple procedure the President and Cabinet are relegated to the rear and the "war cabinet" is to assume supreme command.

It would seem that the mere statement of the scheme would show how impossible it would be of enactment or of operation. The proposal is to create an executive body which shall have supreme executive authority. The Constitution provides: "The executive power shall be vested in a President." The proposal is to give authority to the newly created "war cabinet" to formulate "plans and policies" to carry on the war, and "to direct and procure the execution of the same." The Constitution provides: "The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy." The proposal is to give the "war cabinet" power to "direct and control" all the executive departments. The Supreme Court of the United States declares that the President speaks and acts through the heads of departments. It is declared that in order to secure a "central control" and unity of action the conduct of the war should be committed to three persons rather than to one. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution says:

Of all the cases and concerns of government, the direction of war most peculiarly demands those qualities which distinguish the exercise of power by a single hand. Unity of plan, promptitude, activity, and decision are indispensable to success, and these can scarcely exist except where a single magistrate is intrusted exclusively with the power. Even the coupling of the authority of an executive council with him in the exercise of such powers enfeebles the system, divides the responsibility, and not infrequently defeats every energetic measure.

It is entirely unnecessary to quote this apt and authoritative statement in order to convince the American people of the excellence of their present constitutional system. The history of the Nation throughout 129 years of eventful and glorious experience under it is a sufficient answer to the proposal that it should now be revolutionized and overthrown. It does not need technical knowledge nor even a particular study of our fundamental law to show that the proposition both in spirit and letter is unconstitutional. The avowed purpose, the central idea of the proposal, is in contravention of the Constitution. In its provisions and by its terms it violates the Constitution. As suggested by the press and as proposed in legislation it is unconstitutional.

A "NEW WAR CABINET" UNNECESSARY.

Never before has any serious attempt been made to substitute a new cabinet to control the present Cabinet. Never before has it been proposed to take from the President the direct control of the heads of departments. If merely a change in the personnel of the present Cabinet is desired, that can be secured without creating a new body. It is proposed that the President shall appoint the new cabinet; he may change the present one. He may dismiss peremptorily any or all of his present Cabinet and appoint any whom he may select to fill their places. It is entirely unnecessary, therefore, to create a new Cabinet because of dissatisfaction with the personnel of the present Cabinet.

I have endeavored to show that Congress has no power to usurp or transfer the prerogatives of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Under existing conditions the President, as Commander in Chief, may be and should be in constant communication and consultation with the General Staff and the war chiefs of both the Army and Navy, as well as with the heads of those departments. He is thus placed in close touch with the technical war work—the planning of campaigns, the movements of troops and ships, the assignment of units, and all those matters which he must consider as Supreme Commander of the Nation's forces on land and sea. The relation for consultation and advice between the President and the Army and Navy is maintained by direct contact between the President and the General Staff and the heads of military departments. To attempt to create an intermediary body which shall be given power to control and direct both the operations of the Army and Navy, and the activities of the departments is clearly unconstitutional. It is also unwise and unnecessary.

NEW DEPARTMENTS.

The tremendous expansion of the activities of the Government occasioned by the war demands a corresponding enlargement of governmental machinery. Our present system provides for such enlargement without changing our form of government. Whenever the growth of the Nation and the increase of governmental activities have required we have created new departments of the Government. We started with 3, we now have 10. Departments have been added from time to time to keep pace with the development of the country. Additions are made whenever the existing machinery is inadequate to meet the increased requirements for effective administration. In this way the demands of 100,000,000 people have been as easily and satisfactorily met as were the demands of 3,000,000. In this way not only ordinary requirements but extraordinary requirements can be satisfied without violating the Constitution or abandoning our normal and safe procedure. If because of the war our governmental activities have so increased that the present departments can not satisfactorily and with the desired efficiency meet existing demands, new departments should be added. These new departments need not be continued for longer than the war, if they shall be no longer required. There is no reason why, being established to meet an emergency, they should not be abolished when the emergency shall cease to exist.

A DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION.

There should be established a department of transportation, with a Secretary, who shall be a member of the President's Cabinet. Perhaps such legislation should not be enacted at this time, because of the President's action in taking over the railroads and the appointment of a director. But conditions thus created are necessarily temporary and legislation will soon be required. The immense importance of transportation by land and sea and the intimate relation it has with all governmental activities in the prosecution of the war require that the chief of this great branch of the Government service shall be the head of a department with the necessary authority and a seat in the Cabinet.

It would appear that the time has come when the department of transportation should be established, not only to meet the demands occasioned by the war but as a permanent departmental establishment of the Government. Transportation, including steam and electric railways, conveying both passengers and freight; steamboat and barge traffic in our rivers, lakes, and canals; shipping of all kinds, engaged in both the coastwise trade and in foreign commerce, requires coordination and governmental supervision and control of the highest character and with power and responsibility such as can only be obtained by placing such supervision and control in a department of the Government. If the railroads should be returned at the close of the war to their former status, their relation to the Government which will have been established during the war will be so close and the responsibilities which will have been assumed by the Government so large as to require a separate department. If Government ownership, in whole or in part, shall be instituted at the close of the war, the demand for departmental control will be imperative. In any event, it is time the United States should do as other great nations have done—make transportation one of the great administrative departments of the Government.

DEPARTMENT OF MUNITIONS.

There also should be established a department of munitions, with a secretary who shall be a member of the President's Cabinet. This department should be established at once, and should go out of existence at the close of the war. There are at least two reasons why the present departments have been found inadequate to meet expectations and secure the degree of celerity and efficiency demanded by the present crisis. One reason is that the requirements for increased service have been so tremendous that the present organization of the departments have been overwhelmed with the pressure. We have been so confident in our fancied security that no preparations for a large Military Establishment have been made. Neither have we even gone so far as to provide for an enlargement to meet a possible contingency or a great emergency. For this all parties, all Government officials, and the people themselves are responsible.

To meet the unexpected and unprepared-for emergency the administration has put forth its utmost efforts. It has a really creditable record of accomplishment when the defects of the system are considered. The blame, if blame is merited, attached because of a failure to realize the inadequacy of our present system to meet the emergency and a want of readiness to admit that deficiency and to take prompt and effectual measures to remedy the defect. It will not help matters, however, to propose and insist on unconstitutional methods of remedy. Neither shall we accomplish what we all desire—a reorganization that will secure efficiency—if we merely protest and complain. Constructive criticism is of value, but mere faultfinding will not help, but harm.

The other reason for the failure to reach expectations is that we have not realized that preparation for war is of two kinds, one military and the other pure business; and that to commit the business of preparation to military men is as unfortunate as it would be to commit military operations to business men. In peace times it was possible to leave the organization and management of our Military Establishment in the hands exclusively of the officers of the Army and Navy. Among them could be found men with sufficient business capacity to care for the limited business concerns of the departments. But when war came and with it the demand for the speedy arming and equipment of millions of men, the business part of the organizations grew to such enormous proportions as to be beyond the capacity of the officers to properly and expeditiously handle. They were not educated for business, they were educated for war. They had selected military not business careers. They had been commissioned because of military ability, not because of business capacity. Some of them have developed unexpected business facility, but there is not enough of those thus endowed. It has been found that the undertaking is too large for the equipment.

How large that undertaking is we have been slow to realize. To fully clothe and equip 2,000,000 men for modern warfare, to send them 3,000 miles across the sea, and to maintain them there till victory shall come is a task never before even contemplated by any nation in the world. To accomplish it will require the organized and mobilized productive and industrial capacity of all our 100,000,000 of people. We must bring production to an unprecedented volume in every line of agriculture, of mining, and of manufacture. We must bring all our transportation systems under a unified and nationalized control. We must tender to the Government the entire activities of the country, systematized and made effective, if we would win the war.

Great Britain faced the same problem when it was called to war. It found that its military establishment was not organized to carry on successfully the military and at the same time the business work of the war. Early it separated these great branches of war work, leaving to the military establishment the work of caring for purely military matters, and transferring to a new department the purely business portions of preparation and support. It created a new place in the cabinet and established the ministry of munitions. Under Mr. Lloyd-George, who was appointed head of the new department, the productive and industrial forces of the nation were organized for war, and almost from the day when this was done efficiency and accomplishment were secured. What has been accomplished in Great Britain under their present system has been not only satisfactory, it has excited the wonder and admiration of the world.

What Great Britain has done we should do. Her difficulty then is our difficulty now. The remedy she applied we should use. Fortunately such action would be in exact accordance with our constitutional system. We have established new departments in the past whenever needed. That time has come now. Such action will effect no disruption of our system. It need occasion no delay. It will allow our War and Navy Departments to give their entire energies to securing men and ships, to train the men and man the ships, to transport troops and arms and ammunition and supplies across the seas, to plan campaigns, and to develop the military policies and operations which shall most speedily bring us victory and a lasting peace. Most of the activities of both the Army and Navy Departments are now devoted to hunting for sources of supply, to making contracts, to arranging for transportation and deliveries, to discussing prices, and other purely business transactions. Under the new system it would only be necessary for the War and Navy Departments to make their requisitions, and the business of securing the arms and ammunition according to the plans and specifications and at the time and place specified would be given the department of munitions, a purely business organization composed of business men.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR SUPPLIES.

There should be established a department of war supplies, with a secretary, who shall be a member of the President's Cabinet. This department should be established at once, and should go out of existence at the close of the war. To this department should be committed the procurement for the Army and Navy on requisitions therefor all classes of war supplies other than those included under the term munitions, including food, feed, fuel, medical and surgical stores, uniforms, tentage, barrack utensils, autos and trucks, horses and mules, and all other supplies of that class.

Under the authority of the Council of National Defense numerous independent boards have been created, to which have been committed many of the war activities. These boards have no power to contract or to bind either the producers or the Government. They are advisory only, and their action is subject to the approval or disapproval of the department. These independent boards, composed in large part of persons serving without salary, have rendered in most instances patriotic and valuable service. They have been, however, a serious impediment to efficiency and expedition. Their service has been at times clouded with the charge of self-interest. They are manifestly a temporary expedient, and the time has come when they should be eliminated. The men who have served on them, who have demonstrated their ability and fitness, should be made the heads of bureaus in appropriate departments and be given authority commensurate with the importance of their work.

Thus within the jurisdiction of the department of transportation should be placed the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Shipping Board, the committee on shipping, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the Board to Determine Priority in Transportation, and the coordinating committee on exportation.

To the department of munitions should be given jurisdiction now exercised by the War Industries Board, the Munitions Standards Board, the Aircraft Board, and the Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

To the department of war supplies should be committed the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the War Trade Board, the committee on supplies, the committee on raw materials, and all the so-called purchasing committees of the Council of National Defense.

In this way, and in this way only, as I believe, can coordination of the war activities of the Government be obtained. To secure efficiency, expedition, and economy of expenditures there must be authority and responsibility. The prevention of duplication of work is important. The bidding against each other of the departments and bureaus should not be allowed to continue. The necessity of the immediate abandonment by the departments of red tape, circumlocution, and unnecessary routine is apparent to all. The kaleidoscopic changes that are almost daily bulletined from the War Department are none of them calculated to cure these evils. Efforts made by the department to eliminate, as far as possible, red-tape methods will undoubtedly help. But the great necessity, and the one the department seems unwilling even to consider, is that the department be relieved of the purchasing business. This for some unaccountable reason it is unwilling to relinquish. It would seem as if the officers who compose the personnel of the department would be glad to be relieved of the embarrassing duties for which they are so illy fitted and in the performance of which no credit can attach to them. It would appear that being educated for the purpose they would desire to devote their attention to purely military problems and be relieved from business routine and office drudgery. It might be expected that their desire would be for active service in the field where their qualifications fit them to serve with distinction and where now they are so much needed. When the demand for officers educated to train recruits for service and to command troops in the field is so great and the supply is so small it is difficult to justify holding West Point graduates to positions as office clerks, in the performance of purely business transactions.

With the organization of the new departments for war service the war cabinet so earnestly desired may be secured. With the President at its head, it would consist of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the secretary of transportation, the secretary of munitions, and the secretary of war supplies. With the absorption by the new departments of the present independent boards practically all the war activities would be represented in such a war cabinet. Meeting daily, as do the European war cabinets, all the work essential to progress could be considered and correlated. Unity of action, speed in accomplishment, and effectiveness in execution would thus be made possible. The Constitution is not violated under this method of reorganization. The President is not deprived of his power. The War and Navy Departments would be strengthened for real war work, and the heads of these departments could give to the greater problems of the war the consideration necessary and which is impossible while they are burdened with duties others can better perform. Big men, in whom the Nation would have confidence, could thus be given the great work of carrying on the war and could be placed in closer relationship for conference and advice with the President. The reorganization necessary would be very moderate. As compared with the changes in administration methods and personnel that have taken place in other countries engaged in the war, it would be inconsiderable. Entire reorganizations of the cabinets of Great Britain, Germany, France, Austria-Hungary, and Italy have occurred many times during the war. They have made without hesitation the changes found necessary to meet the increased demands of Government work occasioned by the war. We should not wait until failure to meet the extraordinary demands by existing machinery shall lead us to more drastic and dangerous measures.

I have endeavored to show that an attempt to deprive the President of his constitutional powers as the head of the executive departments of the Nation and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is unconstitutional and unwise.

I have tried to point out that the creation of a war cabinet as an independent body is practically impossible, and that by the creation of the three new war departments of transportation, munitions, and war supplies, and the appointment of "three distinguished citizens of demonstrated executive ability" as the heads of these departments, together with the Secretaries of War and the Navy, would give the President a war cabinet, as a natural consequence and on a constitutional basis.

I have sought to show that this proposition is not revolutionary, will not be a mere experiment, and need cause no embarrassment to the President or to the departments affected by the proposed changes. Above all, that it will cause no delay and will assist and facilitate the great work of carrying on the war.

It is only necessary further to say that whatever the machinery provided, that whoever may be called to the Nation's service, even if the action taken be considered unwise, and even if we believe the persons in service inefficient, our duty is done when we use our best endeavor to correct what we believe to be the defect. If suggestions are not followed, if the remedies advocated are not adopted, we are not thereby relieved from doing all that we can to support the prosecution of the war with the men and the measures which are provided. It would be unfortunate if honest endeavors to correct defects were unavailing. But it would be still more unfortunate if because such advice is not taken any one should either remain indifferent or in opposition to the vigorous prosecution of the war. That object should be and remain our supreme desire and duty whatever the means provided and whoever shall remain in or be called to the service of the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, in line 8, page 77, the words "personal services and."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BORLAND: Page 77, line 8, after the word "including" strike out the words "personal services and."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this bill contains a great many provisions for increases of the clerical forces. I do not intend to offer to this appropriation bill any amendment in regard to the hours of service in the departments, because it is a deficiency bill and, of course, temporary in its character. But the fact that it does provide for so many increases in the clerical force simply accentuates the unfortunate situation in which we have gotten in employing a large number of people for a short day's work and attempting to provide office space and housing for that excessive number.

Now, in this particular paragraph these personal services are probably more imperative than any other paragraph in this bill. I simply want to call attention to the fact that the way, in my judgment, to remedy the evil of an excessive number of employees in Washington is, if a resolution comes before the House to provide for a general increase and classification of salaries for the employees, to provide in that resolution for the increase of the working hours from seven hours to the standard eight-hour day.

If that is not done it will be necessary to append the amendment to each appropriation bill as it comes through the House. In order that there may not be any sidestepping of the eight-hour proposition I intend to offer it to every appropriation bill as it goes through the House. I hope the amendment will remain in the Agricultural appropriation bill as it has gone through the House and receive the approval of the Senate.

It seems that this simple business proposition has produced a great deal of bitterness in the District of Columbia. One Herostratos undertook to acquire fame by burning down the temple of Diana at Ephesus, but he failed to acquire fame. That man was a piker. He ought to come to Washington and attempt to change the hours of Government clerks to eight hours a day, and he would acquire fame enough to last him for the rest of his life. [Laughter.] Strange to say, that simple business proposition, which receives the assent of every assemblage of American citizens outside of the District of Columbia, has produced intense bitterness in the District, and I regret that exceedingly.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I have some protests by some organizations against the gentleman's proposition. I understood the gentleman to say that it met with universal approval.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; there is a propaganda operating from Washington to get organizations throughout the country to send protests to Senators and Representatives. I have received some of those protests, and I have answered them in this way: I have telegraphed each one "You are jeopardizing your own just claims for consideration in Congress by interfering in a matter of the greatest discrimination and injustice in the District of Columbia." That is the only answer to be given them, and when they look into the matter they will conclude, as the organizations in my district have, not to help perpetuate the abuse of a short day in the District of Columbia.

As I say, the proposal has stirred up a great deal of bitterness in the District, and I regret it; but that does not change my opinion of the legislative power or the legislative duty of Congress to correct the abuse. It does seem to me that it is an imperative thing during the extreme shortage of labor all over the country, when we are bringing thousands of young people here as we are in this bill, to attempt to perform Government service in the District of Columbia, and thereby increase the shortage of labor of the business men and the farmers throughout the country, making it more difficult for them to speed up, making it more difficult for them to produce supplies for the Army, making it more difficult for people to pay taxes which are exacted of them; when we are doing that we must look well to these appropriations for personal services in the District of Columbia. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment, and I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave to extent his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask to proceed for a few minutes out of order. Yesterday in my mail came a remarkable letter, which I think is worthy of mention in the Halls of Congress of the United States and also of being called to the attention of the country. I live in the city of Charlotte, Mich. It is a city of 5,800 inhabitants. Of course we are all proud of our home towns, our district, our State, and our country. I have lived there for 50 years, all of my active life, and while there has been a great change there have been no conditions like the present times from many standpoints. That city readily purchased its share of liberty bonds. It subscribed nearly double the amount of its allotment. It has subscribed liberally to the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, and all over the city are active workers in the prosecution of the war.

Recently they were asked to subscribe to the war savings and thrift stamps. They have two splendid organizations in the city—the commercial club and the community association—both composed of active, determined business man, well united. When the call went out by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell $2,000,000,000 worth of these stamps a survey was made of the town; it was divided into small districts and two persons appointed in each district to look after the sale of these stamps. And I am pleased to say here upon the floor of this House, in the Congress of the United States, the greatest in the world, that every man, woman, and child in that city purchased a war stamp or a thrift stamp. [Applause.] We are all proud of that up in our city. That was splendid; but may I particularly mention the fact that Charlotte, Mich., was the first city in the United States where every citizen—man, woman, and child—purchased a liberty stamp under this call. [Applause.] It proves not only that the patriotism of that city is 100 per cent but it also proves that the people residing in that splendid little city are alive to the work in hand; that they are doing their share to win the war; that they not only subscribe their funds but gave of their time and ability to this work. After their plans were perfected within three days every man, woman, and child had their names down on the list and opposite the name was the number and amount of the stamps purchased by that individual.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is a remarkable circumstance which the gentleman is relating. Where did this occur?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. At Charlotte, Mich. That city is also remarkable in its citizenry. It has only two colored families. They are highly respected and good citizens. There is only one Chinaman. He said at first that he would not buy a stamp for 25 cents. When asked why he said, "Me pay $5." And he paid the five.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask if that Chinaman is naturalized?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but he is naturalized enough to put up his money, which is not done by some in other cities who are naturalized and who ought to do it. [Applause.] Then there is one Italian. The rest are splendid American citizens, working together harmoniously and industriously to do their part to win the war.

The work is going on. The determination and resolution shown in that city is illustrative of the district I represent. I say for my district, and I say for the State of Mihcigan, that not only did we meet our share of the liberty loan of $2,000,000,000, but we also oversubscribed the liberty loan of $5,000,000,000, and we will pass on to the next liberty loan, and the next, as long as the necessity of the war requires it. We are ready to do the work in hand, whatever is necessary in defending our country, our homes, and our honor. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Gauge standardization: To provide by cooperation of the Bureau of Standards, the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Council of National Defense, for the standardization and testing of the standard gauges, screw threads, and standards required in manufacturing throughout the United States, and to calibrate and test such standard gauges, screw threads, and standards, including necessary equipment, rental in Washington, and elsewhere, erection of temporary structures, offices expenses, books of reference and periodicals, personal services in the District of Columbia, and in the field, and all other necessary items not included in the foregoing, $75,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In line 22 I see the words—and standards required in manufacturing throughout the United States.

Does that refer directly to the standards employed by the War and Navy Departments, or in general manufacturing? It seems a very broad term. I am aware that at the beginning of the war we were very short of standard gauges for all kinds of necessary war equipment, but it does not seem to me that that phraseology would directly apply to this deficiency. Therefore I would like to inquire whether it is expected that it would apply directly to War and Navy needs, and also whether it is looking toward the establishment of a sort of bureau and storehouse for these gauges for future use?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is looking to the standardization of the gauges used in connection with war needs. They have a master gauge that is made the basis of measurement for the others. It is not with the idea of having any great supply of jigs, gauges, and dies out there.

Mr. TREADWAY. But it is intended to have a master gauge that could be kept indefinitely.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is there not a typographical error in line 2, page 78? Should not that word "officers" be "office"?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. I move to amend, in line 2, page 78, by striking out the word "officers" and inserting the word "office."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 78, line 2, strike out the word "officers" and insert in lieu thereof the word "office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public utility companies: To enable the Bureau of Standards to make investigations urgently needed by public utility companies in order to improve their efficiency and adjust their methods of operation to meet the changed economic conditions incident to the war, and to aid State and municipal administrative officers and the management of publicly owned utilities in adjusting standards of service when necessary to meet present conditions, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $50,000, to continue available during the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is not a good deal of the work designated here to come under the Bureau of Standards being handled at the present time under investigations of the Department of Labor?

Mr. SHERLEY. Nothing of this sort at all. This is to make certain investigations touching the manufacture of gas, so as to save some by-products for the use of the Government in making explosives. Gas in many localities is now manufactured of a different quality from what was used in time of peace, and that is done in order to save a larger amount of by-products that there is a scarcity of needed in the manufacture of explosives. This is to further study and help in that work.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question. In line 7, on page 78, there is a provision for testing and investigating the use of scales and mine cars used for weighing and measuring coal dug by miners. In western Pennsylvania that is done by the Bureau of Mines located in Pittsburgh, where they have a large building containing a laboratory and a number of experts who do that work. Is it proposed to remove that work from Pittsburgh, where it is near the mines and where every person can have access without travel expenses, down here to Washington to the Bureau of Standards?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is not proposed to do any such thing. It is to send out and test mine scales which they have found in many instances to be defective.

Mr. ROBBINS. The provision is all right, and it ought to be carried, but the thought that strikes me there is that it would be duplicating the work that the Bureau of Mines in Pittsburgh is doing for the bituminous-coal region in western Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERLEY. No. It is proposed to test the scales where they are.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is exactly what they do from the Bureau of Mines at Pittsburgh. They send out a man wherever there is a complaint made and they test the scales.

Mr. SHERLEY. The statement was made before the committee that they have discovered a great deal of false weighing, and that the purpose of this money was to enable the bureau to cooperate with the States in establishing standard weights by which the State governments could test the various scales used in their respective States, and it serves to decentralize and take from the Federal Government and put where it belongs on the State government the doing of this highly important work.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

To enable the Secretary of Labor to advance to wage earners transportation to such places as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of securing employment in connection with the prosecution of the war, $250,000, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918: Provided, That advances hereunder shall be so made as to insure the return to the Treasury of sums so advanced: Provided further, That an accounting shall be kept of the operations under this paragraph which shall include as to each person transported the following: Name, vocation, starting point and destination, shipyard, factory, or other place for which transported, and amount of advance made.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph just read. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether it is proposed under this authorization to advance money to laborers in general regardless of whether they are to be employed by the Government or whether it is to be limited to a class or extended to all laborers who may in any way be employed in advancing the Government's interests?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is my understanding it is not limited in the sense that they are to be employed directly by the Government, but it is expected to be used only in those cases where the employment is necessary in connection with work done for the Government in the prosecution of the war, and that it is a war measure, seeking to deal with an acute situation that now confronts the country. The gentleman will recall that the other day, in speaking in general debate, I called attention to the fact of how there had been congested in certain States three-fourths of all war contracts and in one State—the State of New York—one-fourth of them. Now, that of necessity has resulted in a tremendous need of laborers in certain localities way beyond the power of those localities to furnish, and the testimony clearly showed the needs of some governmental action being taken looking to help the men who were unemployed to go to places where employment waited them and where their labor was much needed in order to carry on activities in connection with the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has any plan been evolved by the Department of Labor as to the method of securing the return of the funds advanced as provided by this paragraph?

Mr. SHERLEY. The detail of it has not been worked out. The bureau dealing with this particular matter has recently been organized and enlarged, and the suggestions contained herein were the suggestions which originated with the subcommittee dealing with the bill and were put there with the idea of safeguarding as far as possible the expenditure of this money.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to call the attention of Members who are interested in the subject of farm labor to an anonymous letter I received from a senior student at the Alabama Polytechnic Institute a few days ago, which to my mind presents a rather practical suggestion along this line. I realize that it has no place under the provisions of the pending legislation, and probably can not under any circumstance come within the purview of congressional action, yet it is a matter that I think ought properly be called to the attention of the House. In my time I read the letter:

AUBURN, ALA., February 2, 1918.

Hon. WM. B. BANKHEAD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Complying to your letter of request, beg to say that at this critical moment and needy time for more food, warrants the best efforts of all Americans who can produce anything for the table or for feeding live stock, which means a table necessity in the end.

There are many young men who are still in the colleges and universities of the United States that have not yet been rushed to the "colors." In view of the fact that the seniors will have gotten all the fundamentals by April 1, I believe there should be a provision made allowing these institutions to graduate the senior classes April 1, provided these men will sign pledges to go home and engage in farming, or they may be employed by the Government to engage in some emergency food-producing activity. I feel that this pledge should be signed for at least 10 weeks from April 1. Owing to the great conflict that is pending between the great nations of the world, I believe the food production within the United States this season determines the destiny of this and the allied countries.

We are interested in the success of our country, first of all, to such extent as to be willing to make any sacrifice necessary to win in the great struggle that is now pending, because we believe that we are right. Yes; we are willing to help feed our soldiers who are in the trenches or elsewhere, even though we do it at a sacrifice at any cost.

I am a member of senior class, Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn, Ala., finishing in four departments June 12. My home is in your district—

Here is one of the things which impressed me about this letter—

I am 36 years of age, but my heart and my interest is for this country. Yes; I can plow a mule or two mules this season if it will tide this country over a tottering bridge.

May we note any provision leading to this end?

Respectfully,

A MEMBER OF SENIOR CLASS,
ALABAMA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE,
Auburn, Ala.

Now, gentlemen, I do not know how it is in other States, but in the State of Alabama we not only have a very fine agricultural and mechanical college, with an attendance of some 1,000 or 1,500 students, but also in each congressional district there is a district agricultural school with a large number of students. And one of the suggestions made here, in view of the fact that the students who attend these agricultural schools in Alabama are, as a matter of fact, boys who have been reared upon farms and who have practical actual knowledge of farm labor and farm conditions, if some means could be devised, even by suggestion, to the presidents of these institutions in the different States by the Members of Congress, although it would not aggregate a very enormous number of farm laborers, yet it would amount, indeed, to several thousand of the most efficient and best young men of the country who might sign a pledge to work from April 1 for 10 weeks or longer, providing they were allowed to be graduated at their colleges, to go home and render most efficient and splendid service by filling up in some measure at least the shortage in farm labor. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may return to page 48, and that lines 21 to 25, page 48, lines 1 to 25, page 49, lines 1 to 8, on page 50, all inclusive, may be restored to the bill for the consideration of the committee. On Saturday the point of order was made to these provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to return to pages 48, 49, and 50, to restore the language contained in lines 21 to 25, on page 48, line 1 to 25, on page 49, and lines 1 to 8, on page 50. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to state that I made the point of order on Saturday against these two items because they were clearly subject to the point of order, and it was so held by the Chair, but I want to state to the committee that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on Saturday considered it and to-day considered it again, and we are clearly of that opinion and the House seemed to be of that opinion. We have made the point of order, Mr. Chairman, purely and solely for the purpose of attempting to preserve the jurisdiction which the rules of the House has given us, believing that those rules ought to be maintained and preserved where jurisdiction is clearly defined, but understanding that this matter has already been gone through with by the Committee on Appropriations, and having been appealed to by those interested as to its urgency, knowing, of course, that a reference of the items now to our committee may delay the matter, although we could, of course, dispose of it in a very few days, but there would have to be another appropriation bill brought in to carry it out, and in order not to stand in the way we have decided that we will not press the objection.

I want to say this, however, Mr. Chairman, that this is not to be considered as any precedent whatever. We are not intending to concede in the slightest degree that we have not full and complete jurisdiction over the subject matter, and I want to give notice that hereafter we shall certainly insist on points of order against items of this character. I do not think, and our committee does not think, that it is any effort on the part of anybody to reach out and take jurisdiction that does not belong to them. The trouble is that these department officials get up a lot of data when they want certain legislation, and in order to run along the shortest route, as they take it, go to the Appropriations Committee, and file this data, which ought to go to some other committee. And it seems to me the whole House ought to be interested in preserving the jurisdiction of the respective committees and let these department officials and everybody else understand that they must go in the orderly way, to the proper committees in the House, in order to get legislation which they think is advisable and proper.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Did the gentleman's committee go into the merits of this proposition? It seems to me, from what I will have to admit is a cursory examination, that this appropriation is to be used for buildings not good enough for permanent buildings.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will state to the gentleman that our committee has not examined into the question at all. We have never considered it from any point except the question of jurisdiction. All the data and all the facts have been placed before the Committee on Appropriations. Those gentlemen have investigated it, and for any information about it the gentleman will have to apply to them. I know nothing about the merits of the proposition.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Here are $8,000,000 to be spent on temporary buildings, built of reinforced concrete, which, of course, will have to have heavy foundations and all that. They can be built for much less and answer the purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will say to the gentleman that we have already spent over $2,000,000 on buildings of the same character and for the same purpose.

I want to make this remark in passing. Last year when these buildings on Sixth Street were contemplated the representatives of the War and Navy Departments stated to the Public Buildings Commission that they wanted 700,000 square feet of space to take care of the overflow of the two departments; that they had made a careful survey, and that space would answer their purposes. We gave them one million and some fifty-odd thousand square feet, and before that building was completed and occupied the same gentlemen are back to Congress asking for appropriations of over $8,000,000 for two and one-half million square feet additional to the million square feet in the first building. Now, as I say, that probably is needed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In just a moment.

I hardly think the Appropriations Committee would have consented to have it go in the bill unless it was needed, but it shows these gentlemen who make calculations as to what space is needed have made a sad mistake in this instance, to say the least of it. They have not made the careful surveys that somebody ought to have made.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did not the gentleman's committee take up the question with any of the departments interested in order to ascertain the number of employees that are to be provided for as covered by this item?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. You have not had any information?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We have not investigated it at all, because it has not been before our committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I notice there is nothing in the hearings as to the total. I presume the Committee on Appropriations was satisfied informally as to the necessity for the item. There is nothing in the hearings about it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I suppose the chairman of the Appropriations Committee could give the gentleman that information. We have made no investigation at all.

I just want to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that this is in the nature of notice that we are going to consent and not raise any objection to this, because it has progressed as far as it has, and we do not care to obstruct; but hereafter we intend to insist strictly on our rights under the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida a question. The gentleman speaks about 1,000,000 square feet having been provided. Were those for temporary quarters?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. They were understood to be such.

Mr. LENROOT. What was the cost of that 1,000,000 square feet?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Something over $2,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I take it that there is no one in the House, on either side of the center aisle, that wishes to delay unnecessarily for one moment the enactment of legislation that will tend legitimately to the prosecution of this war. I know that I shall not press any point of order, although one would lie against this provision. But in view of the great amount of money that is asked for, $8,152,500 in two lump-sum appropriations—one of $5,775,000 and one of $2,377,500—one sum to be turned over to the Secretary of the Navy, to be spent under his supervision nominally, although, as a matter of fact, it will be impossible for him to give personal supervision to the expenditure; and the other sum to be turned over to the Secretary of War, to be expended under his supervision nominally, although, as a matter of fact, we all know that he is so occupied with the enormous demands of his office that he can not give these expenditures his personal supervision. And after all that by way of parenthesis, I add this: That we ought to insist before we vote this through that there be a demonstration before this Chamber of the necessity of such an enormous expenditure for temporary buildings.

Last summer, as the House will recall, there was quite a spirited debate on the proposal made in the bill which was then in charge of the gentleman from New York, now not a Member of the House, Mr. Fitzgerald, for $2,000,000 with which to put up temporary frame buildings. I thought that $2,000,000 worth of lumber put into temporary buildings would cover all the vacant space, practically, that there is in the city of Washington; but they expended it all, and now they want only the modest sum of $8,000,000 additional for temporary structures, making in the aggregate approximately $10,500,000 for temporary structures.

Now, the conditions prescribed in the lines included within the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the distinguished chairman of the committee, are very general in their character. They mention only the area of the buildings, with very little more. They define their location with reasonable precision, but practically $8,000,000 is turned over to the discretion of two men, and neither of them can give the expenditure his undivided attention or anything approaching his undivided attention.

Now, relying upon the judgment of my friend from Kentucky, the members of the committee—and, by the way, I do not understand that the full Committee on Appropriations took this testimony. It seems so from the record, which tends to show that the testimony was taken only by a subcommittee of five; and I notice, in looking through the list of the names of the subcommittee, the name of one whom I have hardly seen here at all since January. That leaves but four, and all of these facts together make it necessary, I think, that as cautious legislators we should require full and detailed statements, which will demonstrate the necessity for an appropriation like this for temporary buildings.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. ROBBINS. I understand these temporary buildings that were authorized down on the old Pennsylvania Depot square, or depot site, were increased beyond a million feet beyond what Congress authorized. Is that true or not?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know.

Mr. ROBBINS. What is the necessity of using this park and cutting down those trees when there is a wide space between here and the Union Station with no trees on it? The parks should be used in connection with the beautifying of the city of Washington.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, and I think before that matter is settled the committee is entitled to know what information the members of the committee can give to the House as to the necessity of this appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no desire on the part of anybody to take snap judgment of the House. I assumed that instead of now undertaking to debate the matter on request the debate would come up naturally in the discussion of the restored paragraphs.

Mr. LENROOT. If the point is not reserved, and the committee is not able to give the fullest information desired, it would not be the fault of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman misunderstood my request. I did not request that the matter be considered in the bill in the sense of having been approved by the Committee of the Whole. I suggested that it be restored to the bill for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole. I do not want to mislead the gentleman. If my request should be acquiesced in, it would result in putting the matter into the bill for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Beyond the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. With the idea that the point of order would not be made. There is no use in doing a foolish thing. The point of order has been made. The idea was to put the provisions in for consideration. It would be in order to strike out or amend, or anything else.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to have some information as to what the million square feet cost, and why this should cost so much more.

Mr. SHERLEY. I made a very full statement to the House in my opening statement, and I am more than willing to do it again. As a matter of convenience, I will take the floor now.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. If the gentleman can give the information, I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have enough responsibilities. If I can not demonstrate to this House the merits of the proposition, it ought to go out.

Mr. LENROOT. I have no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I feel that this statement should be made in view of the understanding I have had, representing the Committee on Appropriations, with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It might not be amiss to make a short statement as to how this matter got into the appropriation bill at all.

As was suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin a moment ago, there was quite a little controversy over the building at Sixth Street, on a part of the Mall, which, I believe, is about completed—on the square where the old Pennsylvania depot used to be. At that time the subcommittee was requested to take this matter up on account of the very urgency of the need of space for clerks. The matter was taken up at that time by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with the idea that if they had no objection to its being considered in our committee, that committee could have a hearing and report a bill which would then be in order on the appropriation bill, and not delay the matter. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, each representing his respective committee, agreed that it would be better to put it, as an urgent matter, in the urgent deficiency bill. Buildings of that character had been carried prior to that as urgent deficiencies.

Now this subcommittee on deficiencies has been called upon to begin the erection of some permanent buildings not authorized by law. Your subcommittee and the full committee declined to consider the matter at all, on the ground that our jurisdiction would only be limited to this item, on account of its great urgency. Technically we have no jurisdiction of the matter, even under that state of the record, but in view of the pressing need and the necessity of making provision for the thousands of clerks that are being assembled and brought to Washington with no place for them at present in which to work in the various offices, this necessity was represented to the committee, and there was no understanding at that time between the respective committees as to these items. It was my understanding—not the understanding of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, nor did any member of the committee understand it that way—but it was my understanding that as to these temporary buildings they might be considered as urgent deficiency items and cared for by items in the bill.

Now, in addition to all of that matter, there was a commission that had to be consulted. Your subcommittee not only consulted among themselves and with the full committee, but we consulted with the members of the Senate who had handled this matter, consulted with the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, and consulted with the gentleman who has charge of public buildings in the War, State, and Navy Building, and had them all there. All the propositions were presented to the committee; and one or more trips were made by your subcommittee, and one trip with the representatives of the Senate, with those two respective architects representing the two departments of the Government, and after quite a good deal of delay we thrashed out all of the differences. That accounts for this item being in the bill. If it should be considered and passed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, it would then have to come to the Committee on Appropriations for the appropriation.

So this in no sense of the word can be considered as any precedent for the Appropriations Committee taking jurisdiction of public buildings.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I have been particularly interested in is the showing that was made to the committee as to the necessity for housing this large number of additional employees.

Mr. SISSON. I was not intending to go into that feature at this time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the important feature.

Mr. SISSON. I was simply carrying out an agreement which I had with the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that this statement should be made by me, so that it might not be considered as being any precedent or any waiver of jurisdiction on the part of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for this committee to consider items of this kind. Your subcommittee and your full committee realized thoroughly that we have no jurisdiction of these matters, and I have no doubt that from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations clear on down through the entire committee we would have been delighted to wash our hands of this entire matter and let the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee handle it and fix it so that the appropriation might be made.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to state that he consulted with two architects, representing the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. SISSON. No; with Mr. Woods, Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, who has certain buildings and grounds under his jurisdiction, and who is, by the way, a member of this building commission, as well as Col. Ridley, of the State, War, and Navy Building, who is the superintendent of those buildings and grounds.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then I misunderstood the gentleman about the two architects?

Mr. SISSON. Those are the two men. Mr. Woods is an architect, and Col Ridley also. I did not mean any outside architects.

Mr. TREADWAY. I was endeavoring to find out a little more in detail along the line of the inquiry I made a few days ago—has the committee seen any plans and specifications, so as to know on what method the contracts were to be let?

Mr. SISSON. All our consultation was with officials of the Government.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to know whether the department recommends reinforced concrete; and if so, why is it necessary to have that material for a temporary building?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I think we can get at this whole matter very much more orderly when we get to the consideration of the merits of it.

But, answering now the gentleman's inquiry, the reinforced-concrete proposal came before the committee as the result of two suggestions—one made by the War Department for a concrete building down near Henry Park and one from the Navy Department, who desired a concrete building for themselves. But the determination rested finally with the committee, and was based on the fact that the difference in cost between concrete and frame was not sufficient in our judgment to make worth while the taking of the risk to life and property involved in further housing people in wooden structures.

Mr. WHEELER. Will these buildings be fireproof?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; the concrete will not only be fireproof, but will be as permanent as time, if you want to leave these buildings. They are spoken of as temporary, not with the idea that they will soon wear out, but simply with the idea that these are not the places that would be selected for permanent buildings in the sense that that term is used ordinarily.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the floors and sills be of concrete?

Mr. SHERLEY. All concrete.

Mr. WHEELER. No wooden framework whatever?

Mr. SHERLEY. Flooring and framework and walls and roof of concrete. I will try to give the House the details in a few moments.

Mr. SISSON. In order to conclude my statement and not detain the committee, so that we may get down to the merits of this proposition, so far as I am personally concerned I agree heartily with the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. CLARK of Florida] that the jurisdiction of these two committees should be kept absolutely separate, as the rules indicate; and it is only under the pressing necessities of the present that the rule ought ever to be violated. So far as I am personally concerned, I can only speak for myself, but as a member of the subcommittee I will say that these matters shall not be considered, if I can help it, except after consultation with the chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee or any other committee that may have proper jurisdiction over a matter that might be included in a deficiency bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What induced the committee to insert the provision regarding these structures being built of reinforced concrete, when the $2,000,000 buildings down here are of wood?

Mr. SISSON. It is quite a long story, but I can tell the gentleman in a word. A great many of the clerks and employees in the Navy Department will have to deal with the drawings for the building program of the Navy, and if you did not have buildings reasonably safe from fire it would be absolutely disastrous if those plans and specifications were destroyed. The hearings were complete and the testimony was overwhelming that unless we were in a position to build them fireproof vaults, or a place where they could keep these documents and drawings, it would mean disaster if there was a fire.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Inasmuch as the Government for about 12 years has owned the land from Pennsylvania Avenue to the Mall, down near Fifteenth Street, containing now, as then, many buildings that are nothing but eyesores to that part of the city, why did you not propose to put these new structures there?

Mr. SISSON. The question of time entered into that. We would have to destroy the buildings that are there now, all of which are going to be used for office space anyway. A good many of these buildings are already being occupied. Some buildings are being constructed. As I understand, these buildings will probably be occupied by the Internal-Revenue offices.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It looks like a rather serious proposition to put $8,000,000 of buildings into a magnificent park.

Mr. SISSON. It is a most serious business and there is no question about it, but the subcommittee and the full committee in considering this matter found there was no other alternative.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman say that the full committee considered the bill?

Mr. SISSON. The full committee only considered the statement made by the chairman of the committee, but his statement was very full. They had all the maps before the committee, but had no witnesses there.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In other words, the full committee heard the statement of a witness who had heard the witnesses.

Mr. SISSON. The full committee heard the statement of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And he had heard the witnesses.

Mr. SISSON. The hearing was what the full committees have at times when the subcommittee has investigated the testimony of witnesses; the subcommittee reports to the full committee, and until the full committee was satisfied they would continue the investigation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was only prompted to ask the question because the gentleman said that the full committee had approved of the findings of the subcommittee, and as far as that is concerned I understand from the gentleman's own statement that the full committee knew nothing about the testimony at all except as the chairman came in and gave a synopsis of it.

Mr. SISSON. I did not intend to make any other statement than that it was reported by the subcommittee and was considered by the full committee, and there was no objection to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been stricken from the bill on a point of order. I wish to reserve the right to object. I understand an agreement has been made between the committee reporting this bill and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who made the point of order, and that there is some objection apparent, or some desire on the part of certain gentlemen to learn more about this item before the matter is reinserted in the bill. It seems to me that the statement as to the necessity, and as to the information which the committee procured on this matter, ought to be made before the item is put back into the bill. If it is, then there need not be any discussion of the item at that time, and further time in discussion will be saved. I ask that the chairman of the committee make his statement as to the necessity of this item at this time, and unless that is done I think objection should be made to putting the item back in the bill, and I am willing to make the objection.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The matter has been very fully investigated and the gentleman from Kentucky did make a full explanation in his opening speech, although I think there were not over 40 or 50 Members present. Now, if the point of order is withdrawn and the matter considered on its merits, unless the merits are so strong as to convince the committee, I am satisfied it will be rejected by the committee. But suppose under the gentleman's plan we spent three or four hours in the consideration of this and everyone favored it but one Member and he objected? We would lose all that time. It seems to me that we can trust the Committee of the Whole in the premises. Later on we would have to do it when the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should report. I believe that the inquiry in the committee disclosed that time is of the essence and that prompt action is required.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois that I think this method of mine would save time. The chairman of the committee could outline the matter briefly from facts ascertained the need for this legislation and then that being demonstrated there could be no objection to restoring the item to the bill. We would then be in a position to proceed with the discussion of the matter and close up the discussion of the entire bill within a few minutes.

Mr. CANNON. With this difference, that the majority after discussion would agree or disagree to it, and under the gentleman's plan one man after the discussion could defeat action.

Mr. WALSH. As he can now?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Here is a condition that has got to be met if we do our duty, and why can not gentlemen trust the committee now to consider and let the majority act.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In case this item goes out on a point of order, can not the Rules Committee make it in order?

Mr. CANNON. In the event the majority should ratify the rule, but that would lead to further delay.

Mr. FESS. It is likely to go in anyway, is it not?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know how that may be; I can not tell. When a majority of the Rules Committee would report a rule, and a majority after discussion should adopt a rule, then it would be in order. This situation has got to be met either by a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or upon this report made by the Committee on Appropriations. It seems to me that we now have as much leisure to determine the merits of this matter as we will have at any time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving further the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he prefers to repeat his statement regarding the matter now or after it has been restored to the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say frankly to the gentleman that it seems to me the orderly thing is to do as we would if the point of order had not been raised and the matter was up like any other provision in the bill. I will say frankly to the House that if we can not show the need of these buildings they ought not to be built.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The paragraph has been read and is now restored to the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Have we passed the Department of Labor paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; on page 81.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to discuss that paragraph a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is rather late. We passed page 81, and the gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to return to his item.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the reason I was thrown out. I want to discuss the labor paragraph for a moment.

Mr. SHERLEY. There will be an opportunity for the gentleman to take five minutes in the discussion of it later if he desires.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, there were two proposals in connection with the building proposal that ought to be kept distinct, one relating to concrete buildings and one relating to wooden buildings.

I shall endeavor to repeat somewhat what I undertook to say to the House in presenting the bill several days ago as to what actuated the committee. There is not a great deal of testimony in the hearings touching the matter. That was not intentional, but came about in this way. It became apparent in the early consideration of the bill, from the letters that were being sent to me as chairman of the committee, the requests that were being made by various departments, and the statements being made by the heads of departments, that there was need of a great deal of space in Washington. It was also exceedingly difficult to get from anyone a statement that matched up with anybody else's statement, because the situation was shifting from day to day. So the committee did what it thought was better than undertaking to take some representatives of the various departments, cross-examine them touching their needs unconnected with other departments, and thus come to a conclusion. It had prepared, through the courtesy of Mr. Brown, the head of the Bureau of Efficiency, a list of questions which it sent out to every department in the Government, asking it to state the amount of space they now had other than that which was Government owned, the rent they were paying for it, the amount of space they would need prior to the 1st of July, and the amount of space they would need subsequent to the 1st of July. Those reports came in in great detail and constitute a stack of papers a foot high. They have been summarized in the statement which I read from the other day, and from which I shall again read to the committee. These reports gave much more of detailed information than we could have obtained in days of cross-examination. The summarized statement showed that there was now being occupied by various departments of the Government—that is, there was as of the 1st of January—we had to fix a date which these returns should be for, so that we could get some uniformity—3,826,511 square feet of space in this city for which the departments were paying a rental which at an annual rate would amount to $1,764,019.40.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that exclusive of the department buildings?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is exclusive of the Government-owned buildings altogether. The statement shows further that these various departments would need prior to the 1st of July, 1918, 2,109,761 square feet of space, and that of the space now used there was to be vacated only 174,409 square feet. So that practically there were 2,000,000 feet of space they said they needed prior to the 1st of July. Then a statement was given as to the amount of space that would be needed after the 1st of July, additional to what has been mentioned, and that totaled 2,316,270 square feet of space. So that if you take the figures at their face it would show an expected need prior to July of next year of four million four hundred thousand and odd square feet in addition to what we are renting, and we are renting now 3,800,000 square feet of space. The moment you get figures that large you do not have to go into details as to how much each department wanted to know perfectly well that all and more than what is being proposed here would be needed by the departments, and particularly you did not have to have testimony to ascertain this fact, because man after man had testified to it, and it was common knowledge that all of the available space in the District of Columbia is now being used. Men are hunting opportunity to find space that is rentable, without regard to the very high prices that have to be paid.

It was perfectly apparent also to anyone who knew the expansion that was taking place in the Government, as shown by estimates that were being made for additional clerical hire, to say nothing else, that these departments were going to expand tremendously. For instance, the War Department used to have on its regular rolls 1,600 employees. It has now upon its temporary rolls 9,000 employees, and the Ordnance alone have now 4,718 employees and estimate that there will be needed in the fiscal year 1919, 4,000 additional employees. It had submitted a formal estimate for an immediate need of about 1,300,000 square feet of space, and it claimed an additional need for next year of over 2,000,000 square feet. The result was that the committee knew, as the slightest consideration will demonstrate, that all of this space would be needed, and more too, and particularly it knew that if we were not to be held up and continue after the war to have to pay the extravagant rentals we are now paying for these 3,800,000 square feet which we are now occupying as rented space we would have to greatly enlarge the building program.

The proposition, then, came down to two questions—the character of buildings that should be put up and where they should be put up. A good deal of criticism had been leveled at Congress because of the erection of temporary buildings of wood. Particularly was there expressed a fear upon the part of the various departments of housing their valuable records in wooden buildings. So much was that so that the Ordnance people had submitted a separate estimate for a concrete building, that was pending before the committee, and the Navy Department testified that it did not desire to be housed in temporary wooden structures. The War Risk Insurance Bureau had urgently pressed upon the committee the need of a fireproof building for the preservation of its records. The committee therefore made some inquiry as to cost, and it developed in connection with the testimony of Commander Parsons, of the Navy Department, that the Navy had constructed buildings for $2.50 a square foot, made of concrete, which were entirely fireproof, and that they were just finishing a storage building over in New York that would average at that figure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to continue for 10 minutes longer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to continue for 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Make it until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may proceed until he concludes his presentation of the matter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. They were very urgent, and requested they be given permission to construct on the ellipse a building which would contain something over 900,000 square feet of space, and which they said would enable them to put all of their now scattered departments into one building and greatly increase the efficiency of the departments.

The State Department was urging its need for 100,000 square feet of space, and particularly the desirability of obtaining additional space in the Army and Navy Building. It developed informally that if the Navy Department obtained the building it required the State Department in large measure could be taken care of in the space the Navy would relinquish in the Army and Navy Building.

On cross-examination of Commander Parsons it developed that the type of building that he desired to build on the ellipse, and which he thought he could build for $2.50, would be a three-story, reinforced concrete building, and that the cheapness of construction would depend somewhat upon the lay of the ground, which would enable them to build a building the ground floor of which would be practically a concrete pavement resting on the ground, and would not need the supports that would be necessary in the upper stories, and thereby very greatly lessen the cost; that a three-story building could be built without any elevators, and that it could also be built within a time limit such as to afford the relief now urgently sought. The moment that came before the committee I think all of us were struck with this fact, that we were having to pay $2.25 for frame. If we could build for $3 of concrete—testimony had developed afterwards that if the ground was not ideal the price would range from $2.50, which was put as the minimum, to $3.08, which was put as the extreme outside limit—if we could build for $3 as against $2.25 for frame, that we were hardly justified in risking either the safety of the people who would work in such buildings or the papers and property which would be housed there, and that it was desirable where we could to build of concrete, if we were not so hurried for time as to make it necessary to build wooden buildings. The committee then undertook to determine where we could best build the amount of space that ought to be built.

It was then found we could put at Seventeenth and B Streets, on the ground that is immediately south of the Pan American building and running to the west, two concrete buildings three stories high that would give a floor space of 920,000 square feet in one building and 835,000 square feet in the other; that we could put in Seaton Park, which is just this side of Henry Park, where the temporary buildings which were authorized last year have been constructed, two buildings—one of 270,000 square feet and one of 300,000 square feet. Then, we could put just west of the present buildings another building that would contain 370,000 square feet. We concluded that if we made one of those buildings of concrete it in time would give to the Ordnance people, who are now occupying two-thirds of the Henry Park buildings, enough fire-proof space to take care of their most important papers and probably take care of their entire need in that regard, and by building the other two buildings of wood we could get, with the remaining one-third of the Henry Park buildings, which the Navy was willing to give up immediately and which had been reserved for them, some 900,000 square feet of space in a few months, and thereby take care of the immediate pressing needs of the Army, and that it could wait for the additional space it would need until the completion of the big concrete buildings. The Navy was willing to wait in order to get into one building of concrete. So the plan worked out in that shape. Now, the basic things that this committee ought to consider are these——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for one question right there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The buildings which are to go west of Seventeenth Street are opposite the Pan American Union Building?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And they are concrete. They go south from that street that is next to the Pan American Union building. Do they cut across that line of small trees which runs from Seventeenth up to the Lincoln Memorial?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think they do take in the first row of small young trees which have been planted there, but they do not go far enough south to interfere with the vista of the Lincoln Memorial; and that was one of the things we tried very carefully to safeguard, that the buildings should not be of such bulk as to extend too far to the south or too far west and obscure or hide the Lincoln Memorial, because, manifestly, none of us desire to do that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is my understanding—the gentleman will know, I suppose—that they were elms brought from England, and that these double rows or trees, one on the north side and one on the south side, which is to have a roadway between, are English elms, and I hope that these buildings will not go down and destroy those trees.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think those elms can be removed without difficulty and I hope they will be removed. Manifestly we had to move forward and we could not find any space where there were not some trees to be sacrificed.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. May I say in passing I do not believe there is any man in this House who has a greater love for a tree than I have, or any man who regrets more the necessity of going upon the park areas than I do, but the situation was such as to force that to be done. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS. In connection with the question of taking trees last year I raised that same question, and I was assured that the trees growing in Henry Park would not be taken, but I observe some of them have been cut down. Why not occupy the space between the Capitol and the Union Station on which no trees are growing, for instance, the Southern Railway Building which is occupied by the War Department and the Union Station occupied by the War Department?

Mr. SHERLEY. There are a number of reasons. In the first place they are totally inadequate. They would not begin to give this amount of space unless you went high in the air, and the moment you get high in the air with a frame building you tremendously increase the risk to life and property from fire. The moment you go high in the air in regard to a concrete building, you tremendously increase both the cost and time of construction. Of course, you have to put elevators in and to build an entirely different type of building.

Now, I want to say this to the committee, as to how we tried to safeguard prices:

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] very properly spoke of the fact that here was some $8,000,000 that was proposed being spent under the War and Navy Departments, and without limitation. Of course, those sums have ceased to be big sums as sums go now. We are voting to be spent by these various departments sums that make these negligible, but aside from that the discretion is not very great that is put in these departments, because we vote moneys to build a certain quantity of floor space, which is predicated upon a fixed price.

Now, the price as to frame buildings is $2.25 a square foot, and as to concrete it is $3 a square foot, and they are required to erect buildings of approximately the amount of area we have indicated for the price we have named. And if the gentleman will simply take the amount named for each of these buildings and divide it by the square feet of floor space, they will find it works out approximately with the wooden buildings $2.25 and the concrete buildings $3.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, the heating apparatus is not included.

Mr. SHERLEY. That includes heating, but not the power for creating the electric light.

This was not blind figuring. We had actual figures as to frame buildings. The buildings in Henry Park would have cost about $2 a square foot if they had been built exactly for what we appropriated, but the need of putting in a sprinkler system and some other additions made their cost run to $2.16 a square foot.

Since they were started there has been an increase in the price not only of lumber but of labor, which is making buildings that are now being erected up back of the Pan-American and Daughter of American Revolution Buildings cost $2.20 to $2.25 a square foot; and we figured on that. As to the concrete buildings, we had the statements of Commander Parsons, and a statement from Gen. Goethals, though the latter statement was simply a general one contained in a letter saying that he thought they could be built for $3 a square foot; but Parsons's statement was the result of some detail work. It was checked over by Mr. Elliott Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol, and it was further checked over as to the heating side of it by an officer of the Treasury Department, in the Bureau of Public Buildings and Grounds. So we undertook to check one man against the other to ascertain what the cost of the concrete would be, and we knew by actual experience what the cost of the frame buildings would be.

Now, it seems to me there are three propositions for the committee to consider: First, is it desirable to build wooden buildings as against concrete, having in mind a cost of $2.25 as against $3? And I ought to say in passing that in the salvage of the concrete you would probably obtain nothing; that the cost of removing concrete would eat up the value of the fixtures, and so forth, that might be salvaged. As to frame buildings, you could probably save about 25 cents a square foot. So that the net cost of these buildings when finally removed would be in one instance $2 and in the other $3 a square foot.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to suggest that in the construction of the floors of these concrete buildings there ought to be a wooden floor over the top of the concrete, or some other kind of covering, that will prevent the dust that arises from the disintegration of the concrete by the movement of people in the room; otherwise they will have a lot of people in there who will have their lungs full of the concrete dust, which will be a source of great danger to those who will be working in there. I speak from personal and practical experience as a builder, and I think that that ought to be taken very carefully into account, and either have these floors asphalted or covered with some kind of material that will not admit of disintegration arising in the form of dust and getting into the lungs of people who are working in these rooms.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am glad to have the suggestion of the gentleman, and in reply I have only to say this, namely, that the $3 figure, I think, is sufficient to give leeway to take care of that kind of thing as it should be taken care of, and I presume that Commander Parsons, of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, who impressed the committee as a man who knew his business, will know how to deal with these mechanical and physical conditions.

Mr. MADDEN. Except I think we ought to see that they deal with them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now the real question is, Shall we turn it and put up buildings for $2 a square foot, and subject to the risk of fire loss, as against fireproof buildings at $3 a square foot?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. By expending $1 more we will insure the lives of the people who have to work there and also preserve these public records?

Mr. SHERLEY. We build an absolutely fireproof building.

Mr. BUTLER. That is worth it.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is another thing that controlled the committee in that regard. When this war is over you are not going to see Washington the city we knew prior to the war. It is never going to contract back into anything like its former size. There is going to be for many years afterwards the need of a great deal of office space, and for all time there is going to be the need of a great deal more office space than in the old days prior to the war.

Now what will happen? If you have only frame buildings, immediately there will come great pressure to have them torn down right away in order that none of the 3,800,000 square feet of space that we are renting at extravagant figures shall be vacated. Every financial influence and every bit of greed that exists in the District of Columbia will be put with all its weight, under one excuse or another, to force the Government to tear down the frame buildings, because they will say, "These things are terrible fire hazards and risks," and while the Government is building the monumental buildings that are permanently to house the departments the rentals will continue to run.

Now, it seemed the part of wisdom for Congress to build buildings of sufficient stability of character and permanency not to be there always but to be there for a sufficient length of time to enable us to adjust ourselves to the situation that will arise after the war is over, and not put us at the mercy of these private owners of property. A use of these buildings for six or eight years, or even a less period, will justify in the saving in rentals the entire expenditure.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In connection with the use of private buildings, will the construction provided for in this appropriation obviate the necessity of taking over such buildings as the Arlington Hotel Building or the new hotel just across the street from the Treasury, which, it is reported, is to be taken over for office purposes?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will answer the gentleman by saying that the space we are here providing is not, in my judgment, sufficient to take care of all the needs of the Government now, including the Treasury needs. I do not think it will be sufficient for that. I believe we are only providing space sufficient to take care of the Army needs and the Navy needs, with perhaps a little bit of leeway for some of the departments that are intimately associated with those two.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Has the gentleman from Kentucky information as to whether or not any of the departments of the Government contemplate taking over that new Washington Hotel?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not heard about that at all. But there is a definite estimate submitted by the Treasury Department for $4,200,000 for the purpose of buying the Arlington Hotel site and erecting upon it a 10-story building, to be used as an annex to the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Are the wooden buildings that the gentleman has described similar in character to the wooden buildings that have been built for the Food Administration and the Fuel Administration?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are, except that they are three story instead of two story.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can the gentleman tell us anything as to how they were built?

Mr. SHERLEY. They were built out of moneys allotted to them by the President, or otherwise available.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What was the cost?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think some of them in the first instance may have cost about $2, but those now in course of erection are costing $2.25.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How are these concrete buildings to be erected? On the contract plan or the cost-plus plan?

Mr. SHERLEY. I assume what would happen would be this, that Commander Parsons, of the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy, would let contracts for the construction of those buildings.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By contract?

Mr. SHERLEY. I presume by contract. He knows the price they ought to cost.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very much in favor of the contract plan.

Mr. SHERLEY. He knows the details of it, and we had the details before the committee.

I want to be perfectly frank with the committee. I am not a builder. I do not know what the cost is, except as experience here has shown us; but we took the testimony of the best men we could find, and I do not think we missed it as to what these buildings are to cost.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the gentleman's explanation is very full.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Kentucky will remember that last summer we made a very considerable appropriation for the erection of an annex building for Treasury purposes beside the Belasco Theater. What has become of that?

Mr. SHERLEY. The plans of that building have been drawn up, but the contracts have not been let, and when the Superintendent of Public Buildings under the Treasury was before the committee he was asked about that, as he was subsequently asked by telephone as to whether he was prepared to submit his estimates of appropriations to carry out that authorization. We learned that the bids would not be invited for some weeks yet; that there was no need for this bill to carry funds in that regard. So that is the condition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is to be a permanent building?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; that is to be a permanent building, to be connected by an underground passageway with the Treasury.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. About the Washington Hotel the gentleman says he has no knowledge?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have heard nothing of that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there anything more needed in this city than additional hotel accommodations?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. There is a lot of this space now, 3,800,000 square feet of space, that ought to be released by the Government for two purposes: First, because of the high price it has to pay for the space; and, second, that space ought to be used for the purposes for which it was originally created—hotel space and accommodations to people who come here, and to the employees who have to live here.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. What proportion of this 3,800,000 square feet will be vacated when these buildings are constructed?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not answer that question.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman did answer it some time ago; 174,409 square feet.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was going to say this, that the statement that is presented showed that they expected to release 174,409 square feet, but I believe and hope that with the consolidation of a lot of these various departments in these new buildings, a great deal of this most expensive space can be given up, and, of course, when the war shall have ended and we have gotten past the peak, which we have not yet reached, there ought to be a giving up of a great deal of this space and full use made of the buildings which we are undertaking to build now.

Mr. FESS. There is a probability of a growing demand. Is there any probability that that growth will continue?

Mr. SHERLEY. My judgment is that if the war continues for a couple of years this building program is going to be laughed at and looked upon then as being as inadequate as last year's program is laughed at and looked upon as inadequate now.

In other words, while we debate, the activities of the Government and the growth of these departments are such as to make your figures antiquated; and one of the difficulties we had was that we were never able to keep the thing straightened out. From day to day a department would tell informally that they needed so many thousand square feet, and then they would hurry down to my room and tell me afterwards that they were mistaken and ask me not to tie them to that, because they had discovered that they were going to need so much more, representing increases sometimes of 30, 40, or 50 per cent. The result was that we ceased to try to work out just the amount of space that was necessary. We brought in a proposition that we knew was conservative, that was well within what is at present needed.

Mr. FESS. Then we ought not to be surprised if we are told within a year from now that none of this space has been vacated?

Mr. SHERLEY. In my judgment, if the war continues an additional year this Congress will be confronted with the necessity of additional buildings.

Miss RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Miss RANKIN. Did your committee consider an appropriation for temporary quarters for women employed by the Government during the war?

Mr. SHERLEY. We did not consider it as a committee. I personally have given some thought to it, as I stated the other day. It has been apparent, I think, to all of us who have followed the expansion of the Government and to those of us who have simply looked at the city as we came back and forth to and from the Capitol, that provision would have to be made, particularly for housing women employees who are coming in, to enable them to have suitable accommodations; but nothing is suggested in this bill and nothing is now proposed to be done by the Committee on Appropriations with reference to that matter.

Now, gentlemen, I do not know that I can add any more to what I have said.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should like to ask one question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The proposed building down in Potomac Park, opposite the Pan American Building, will have no street car facilities very near it?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think that is quite the situation, if the gentleman will permit. It is proposed to extend the Pennsylvania Avenue line, which now turns and goes down on G Street, so as to make a loop; and, in fact, it is now being extended down to and on to Virginia Avenue. That will bring that car line within two or three squares, at the outside, of these buildings.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not know that was being done.

Mr. SHERLEY. And the other car line, at Seventeenth and H Streets, is considerably less than a mile away—less than half a mile from the nearer end of these new buildings. The buildings themselves will extend a considerable distance.

We looked at a great many sites. We went down on this ground. We considered all the places that were suggested. We do not present this as being an ideal solution. We present it as being the most practical solution that the committee were able to work out, and we ask those who would be critical of it to present an alternative as good or better before they undertake to deny this work.

Now, I do not want to take time to read a letter that I received just two days ago from the Secretary of War, begging that he be authorized to go ahead, without waiting upon Congress, because of the present need for building space. I can only say to the committee and ask them to believe me when I say that there has not been a day for the past month when I have not had from one to three calls from different departments urging and begging that something be done about the building program, and that we permit them to go ahead with this work in order that they may not be further handicapped. Now, that is the situation. It has not been a pleasant thing to do. It has not been an easy thing to do, but we would have been derelict in our duty if we had not come to you with a proposal that we thought would help to solve the thing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky, and he knows well, that the facts demonstrate how little Congress looks ahead in the matter of appropriating for the Government. It is only a few years ago, comparatively speaking, that all the property between the Botanic Garden and Fifteenth Street, clear down to the Treasury Building, could have been purchased or condemned by the Government for less than $10,000,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For $9,000,000 and a fraction, and a bill actually passed the Senate providing for it, but that bill was stopped here and never passed the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a better illustration than that. If we had simply had the wisdom last year to have taken all the ground lying back of the Pan American Building, the Continental Memorial Hall of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and the Red Cross Building, running on back to the Government naval hospital, which might have been bought for approximately $1 a square foot, and had put on that ground concrete buildings, we would have had a solution of this problem for some time to come.

Instead of that, these bureaus and departments—the Fuel Administration, the National Defense Council, the War Trade Board, and all these other bureaus—have gone on getting a little piece here and there, building, building, and building, while Congress did nothing. That is the situation, for which my committee, perhaps, is as much to blame as any, because last year we undertook to deal with the matter and did not deal with it adequately.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Illustrating the fact that these increases are likely to continue, as the gentleman says, it is only necessary to call attention of the committee to the fact that when the estimates were made for the department for the $2,000,000 temporary buildings it was supposed that only about 700,000 square feet would be required, and instead of that Congress erected 1,000,000 feet, and now we see how inadequate that is.

Mr. SHERLEY. I thought then that we were cutting our cloth pretty short, but the fear was with the committee then, and is with the committee now, of coming in here with a proposal that seemed too extravagant. We appreciated the fact that there would be a tendency on the part of Members of Congress to criticize what looked like an extravagant proposal, and so last year the chairman of the committee and the committee following him proposed only the building of 1,000,000 square feet.

Mr. TOWNER. And that exceeded the estimates made by about 300,000 square feet?

Mr. SHERLEY. It exceeded definite estimates, but we could then see a great deal more was coming. I shall be glad to explain further, if I can, any other details of this matter. I trust that the committee may accept the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Is it the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations to assume further responsibility of taking over to itself the construction of the housing questions that are now coming up for employees of the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say, speaking for myself, and I have no right to speak for anyone but myself, that if anyone desires to take over the building program in the future I wish him Godspeed, and I shall not interfere with him taking it, providing action is had.

The only reason for the committee acting at this time was not with the desire to interfere with the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee, not with the idea of adding to the power or jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, but because there came inevitably and tied to the proposals for the expansion of these various departments the question of housing them. It was urged upon the committee, and urged with such force that we dare not disregard without being derelict to our duty, the request that this bill be made the medium for affording relief from a situation that was intolerable.

Mr. BARNHART. It could have gone through in the regular way in these two months and a half of the duration of Congress, in which time the matter might have been submitted to the proper committee and have been considered and reported out with an authorization in the regular way.

Mr. SHERLEY. I presume the other committee could have taken jurisdiction and could have acted, though, as I stated on Saturday, I do not think any committee could fully examine all angles of this matter without covering practically the scope that we had to cover in the deficiency bill; but, in any event, that is behind us now.

Mr. BARNHART. In any event, it would seem to be consistent with these departments when they do come to Congress that they should go to the committee that is duly authorized to take up these questions and consider them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to simply say in response to that that I do not control the departments, and have not invited estimates from them touching any matters and do not expect to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the investigation authorized by the deficiency appropriation act approved April 17, 1917, to be conducted by the Committee on the District of Columbia, or a subcommittee thereof, $5,000, to continue available during the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to the paragraph just read.

Mr. SHERLEY. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is too late, and it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. SANFORD. I was on my feet attempting to get recognition by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WEBB). I think the gentleman from New York was in time; he was trying to get recognition.

Mr. SANFORD. I want to ask the chairman of the committee to cite the authority for this appropriation. The burden is upon him to show the law authorizing the item.

Mr. SHERLEY. In the deficiency appropriation act of April 17, 1917, there is this language:

That after the passage of this act the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, or a subcommittee thereof appointed by the present chairman of said committee, be, and are hereby, authorized to continue the investigation directed by House resolution 229 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, and the expenses for the purpose as provided in House resolution 256, Sixty-fourth Congress, out of the contingent fund of the House, a sum not exceeding $7,500 in addition to the unexpended balance of amount heretofore authorized.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that that is not simply an appropriation out of the contingent fund but is a direct authorization as a matter of law, not by a resolution of the House as has been the practice frequently in the past, but an actual declaration of law whereby the committee is authorized to continue the work and certain funds made available. They came before the committee with the statement that the funds were exhausted and asked additional appropriation under the authority in the language I have read. The committee had only the discretion of determining whether or not to vote the money.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is no question but that the Appropriation Committee in this act of 1917, so long as there was no point of order made to the item, could insert in an appropriation bill a provision assigning for this purpose a definite sum of money out of the contingent fund of the House. Of course, if a point of order had been made the item would have been stricken out. It is significant that they appropriated the money from the contingent fund, over which they had no jurisdiction. They did not provide for a permanent bureau of the Government to continue until some act of Congress was passed, but they provided for this investigation "after the passage of this act." These words do not reveal any intention to create a permanent institution. Such an institution could have been established so that in each appropriation bill an item could be carried for this work; but the words used are: "After the passage of the act." They did not say "hereafter this committee shall be permanently authorized to do so and so," or words to that effect. It can not be said that under Rule XXI this appropriation is authorized as a continuance of a public work—the only theory on which the chairman could claim that it ought to stay in the bill—it can not be said that this is a continuance of a public work or object because it has been repeatedly held by different chairman that these public works or objects that are entitled to continuance without any authority refer to tangible things, like buildings or something of that kind. I call the Chair's attention to the provision in the rules, page 363:

By public works or objects already in progress (within the meaning of this rule) are meant only things of a tangible nature like buildings, roads, etc., and not duties of officials in executive departments or the continuance of a work indefinite as to completion and intangible in nature, like the gauging of streams.

If this provision was for the completion of some definite object, a building or a structure, it could, of course, be contended that that original authority in an appropriation bill would give authority to continue bringing in an appropriation to carry it to completion.

But this appropriation is merely, according to the appropriation bill in which it appears, an appropriation of a sum of money not exceeding $7,500 to enable this committee to continue certain investigations that were authorized back in 1916. It is worth while to note, too, that the item now in the appropriation bill before us is a change of law, because in the act of 1917 the appropriation is out of the contingent fund, and now the Appropriation Committee has changed it and provided, not for setting aside a sum out of a contingent fund but providing for an appropriation out of the General Treasury. That is a change of existing law; but I think the important consideration is the object sought by this appropriation, that it is not a continuing object; it is not an object that ought to be continued under this rule; and is not a thing especially excepted by this rule. I think there is no authority for the provision.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, what the object may be is not a matter for the Chair to determine. The language expressly declares what the appropriation is for, and the language in the pending bill is exactly similar to the authorization contained in the deficiency act of last year. It was not simply in allotment of money out of the contingent fund, but was a declaration of law. Whether that was intended is not for me to say, but the effect of it was to create a law on the statute books which says that after the passage of the act this committee shall do certain things that were authorized, and then gave them the money to carry out the doing of that. When the money ran out there was presented the question of a deficiency, and that question was the question that came before the committee. I will be very glad to speak in justification of the appropriation on its merits when the Chair has decided the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WEBB). The Chair was under the impression first that this legislation was enacted by a former Congress, but I find now that the law was passed by the last session of the present Congress, and this being the case the appropriation seems to be entirely in order during this Congress. The language has some "earmarks" of being permanent legislation, but the Chair does not pass on that question now.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest also that it was done at the last session of this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Therefore it seems to be a continuing appropriation, at least during the life of this Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the Chair pleases, it is not the intention of the Chair to hold it is a continuing appropriation, but is an authorization for an appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. As long as this Congress lasts, at least, it is a continuing authorization for an appropriation. As the gentleman from Kansas suggests, it is only a continuing authorization.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It may be an authorization for an appropriation, but it can not be construed as a continuing appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it meant to be an authorization during the life of this Congress; possibly longer, but I shall not pass on that point. Any appropriation made under this law during this Congress would certainly be upheld during the life of this Congress, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to make this statement in justification of the action taken by the committee. As the result of the activities of the Committee on the District of Columbia in checking the accounts between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government there has been recovered for the Federal Government sums that in the aggregate run over $2,000,000.

Prior to the Sixty-fifth Congress there was recovered in connection with the Government Hospital for the Insane $719.535; relief of poor account, 1879, $3.825; error, deduction from revenue, 1897, $8,952; interest paid on last two items, $2,810; Washington Market Co., part rental, $166.012; Washington Market Co., future rentals $202,500; interest on 3.65 bonds, $586.067; and the Government Hospital for Insane, $282,754; or a total prior to the Sixty-fifth Congress of $1,972,458. Recovered during Sixty-fifth Congress on account of court fines in United States cases the sum of $235,750, or a total of $2,208,209. There was an additional indebtedness ascertained and reported to the Committee on Appropriations in December, 1917, on account of construction and equipment of District jail, $125,000, and loan made by act of April 18, 1874, of $97,740, or a total of $222,740. Incomplete investigation indicates that there will be further recoveries of some $360,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, in the face of that showing, the committee did not feel warranted in denying this very small amount of money for the continuation of this investigation.

Mr. MADDEN. The committee concluded after its investigation that the expenditure of this $5,000 would result in yielding to the Treasury of the United States some $300,000 or $400,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was the conclusion on the presentation made to us by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly, if that can be brought about, it is well worth the expenditure of $5,000.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to say anything, because I really have not an opinion as to the merits of this question. I do, however, wish to call to the attention of the committee what the action of Congress has been on this subject.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] says that what he has said is only to be understood as justifying the action of his committee. Of course, it must occur to everyone of us that if a committee of this House is to authorize the expenditure of public moneys out of the contingent fund that action should not come at the instance of the Appropriations Committee. At the close of the last Congress the House gave particular attention to that very subject and to the continuance of this appropriation, which has been running since 1916. Since that time this committee has spent considerable sums of money in investigating the bookkeeping between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia, and at the close of the Sixty-fourth Congress this matter was presented in detail and the House, by a very large vote, on the very last night of the session, and after considering all of the facts, voted against a continuance of this expenditure.

It is not my purpose to say that this money is not wisely spent. I can only say as a member of the Committee on Accounts that I do not know how it is spent; nor is it a matter of my concern; but I do think it is a matter for the concern of the Congress that moneys that are spent in this way by committees of Congress should be spent in a manner that can be said to be duly authorized.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. SANFORD. It does not seem to me that these expenditures are duly authorized when they are brought in here originally as items in a deficiency bill. I do not approve of that method of doing business. In the first place, there is a vast sum of money, I do not know how much, that is appropriated annually for the support of what we call the Auditor for the State and Other Departments, a public officer, a public bureau of the Government, especially created to do this work. For a committee of Congress to come in here and say that that public bureau of the Government has authorized somebody to run through that $2,000,000 and not have an investigation of it, on its face shows a bad performance of public business. If the auditors of the State and of other departments are not doing their public duties, they should be removed from office. If they are permitting anybody to take $2,000,000 of the public funds, then this very committee, that has been operating since 1916, should make a report to this Congress, and with the facts before us we should act. I do not believe in letting anybody run away with $2,000,000 or more——

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, it is not a question of what the present auditors are doing, it is a question of what has happened in the past, and this has been a checking up that has resulted in recovering a large amount of money. Now, the plain facts speak for themselves, and in view of the statements made we were warranted in presenting to the House an appropriation of $5,000, not out of the contingent fund but out of the Treasury of the United States, to carry on this work.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman let me say to him in answer to that, so far as I know, no facts appear. The gentleman has read a statement of large and appalling figures but with this committee at work since the time it was authorized, in 1916, in the last Congress, if we want to see the facts appear, those facts should appear in the report of that committee; but there is no report of that committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know how the facts appear, because the Committee on Appropriations have carried the provisions, as they are carrying them now, which charge to the District of Columbia the difference and credit it to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SANFORD. I know those facts may appear to the gentleman and his committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. They are in the law. They ought to appear also to the gentleman, if he will read the law.

Mr. SANFORD. They ought not to appear to the gentleman in the sense in which the chairman of the committee speaks. Also, if this committee has accomplished this purpose and these results, those results should appear in the report of the committee. I think it is a bad policy to allow a committee of this Congress from time to time to continue the expenditure of public money for doing a public work of this kind without having its results appear in a formal report. I believe investigating committees should be appointed occasionally by this Congress, but when appointed they should report and the Congress should know what they are doing, and it should know from their own statements. The same statement the gentleman makes now was made in the Sixty-fourth Congress, and since that time I have seen no report of the committees. I do not wish to be considered as occupying the position of criticizing anything that has been done by this committee or by this subcommittee; but inasmuch as this item for a long time was carried out of the contingent fund of the House, I think when the House refused to carry it further, if it were to be taken up again, it should have been taken up by the appropriate committee, which is the Committee on Accounts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $12,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Page 81, line 18, after the sum "$12,000" insert the following: "to continue available during the fiscal year 1919."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, that relates to the item for folding speeches and pamphlets. Some of this expenditure will be after July 1. The amendment is to make it available during the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Clerk: For two additional telephone operators from March 1 to June 30, 1918, inclusive, at the rate of $900 per annum each, $600.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes a point of order on the item.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the matter is subject to a point of order, but I would like to make this statement to the gentleman as to why it is carried in the bill.

Mr. SANFORD. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. This provision has already passed the Senate, and representations were made to the committee that there was a great complaint touching the telephone service that was being secured, and that the number of calls coming in and going out of the Capitol and the office buildings had tremendously increased. The head operator of the exchange testified that it was impossible to do the work with the force which she had available, and from the experience that the Members themselves had had it became apparent that there was need of additional operators. For that reason we felt warranted in presenting it to the House, realizing that it was subject to a point of order.

Mr. SANFORD. Does not the gentleman think that this item would just as speedily be taken care of by the Committee on Accounts by providing that the operators should be taken care of out of the contingent fund of the House?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. The Committee on Accounts has no jurisdiction over the employees of the House except as they are paid from the contingent fund.

Mr. SANFORD. This is out of the contingent fund.

Mr. SHERLEY. This paragraph appropriates directly out of the Treasury. The gentleman is making the contingent fund cover too much.

Mr. SANFORD. I hope the chairman of the committee will not say that. The work which I have to do on the Committee on Accounts is not great at all. It is almost ridiculous in amount.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want to be disagreeable. What I mean to say is that the question of the employees of the House is not one that rests with the gentleman's committee except when they are paid from the contingent fund. I do not think that the gentleman should be sensitive about how this item is carried. It is carried here for the convenience of the membership of the House. It is probably subject to a point of order. If anybody desires to make it, all right.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not feel sensitive. On the contrary, I feel that the employment of these telephone operators belongs to the Committee on Accounts, in spite of all that is said to the contrary. I believe that they could be paid out of the contingent fund, and should be paid in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Public Printer: For five additional clerks, at the rate of $1,000 each per annum, from April 1 to June 30, 1918, inclusive, $1,250.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is presumed that these five additional clerks will have something to do with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that is the subject that I want to draw to the attention of the committee at the present time.

This Congress has been passing some extraordinary laws and will pass a number of others, and I have found in frequent conversation with constituents and others who come to me that the public generally is not advised as thoroughly as it ought to be about the importance of some of these laws. The other night in a small conference I drew attention to the fact that a bill was shortly to be considered which contemplated an appropriation of $500,000,000, with authority to expand an incorporation to the $4,000,000,000 limit, and that it would have control of the issue of all future bonds and stocks. Several gentlemen said they had never heard of the proposition. It was new to them. It startled them, and they wanted to know more about it. That is the trouble with the average citizen of the United States. He does not follow the proceedings of Congress as he ought to do. They do not read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Of course all of them can not get on the list.

My quota of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for instance, is exhausted, but I am constantly in receipt of inquiries from all over the district as to additional copies. I find on inquiry today that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD itself, even to the limited issue of 30,000 or 35,000 copies, is not being sent out from the city of Washington.

You gentlemen who sit here and make interesting speeches and take the trouble to dig out important data—as important for the country as it is for the Congress—may be amazed to know that the information which goes into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has not been sent to your constituents for more than two weeks. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has not been going to Texas since the 1st of February. It has not been going to California since the 1st of February, and I may add, since the gentleman from New York is interested, that it has not been going to New York since the 1st of February. Even the newspaper offices are not getting it; and to that extent what is going on in Congress is not known to the people of the United States, except we rely upon the necessarily meager but competent reports of our friends in the press gallery.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. But while the Public Printer is unable to send out the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on account of a desire to save paper, the Bureau of Information and all the departments are running press bureaus at the cost of the people, and sending unlimited quantities of printed matter all over the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is making a part of my speech and doing it better than I can. I intended to call the attention of the other side of the House to that, that hundreds of thousands of various publications issued by the Bureau of Information are going all over the United States, and——

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And probably clogging the mails, while that one vehicle of authentic information to the people of the United States, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is not going out at all.

Now I yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. Has the circulation of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD through the mails been stopped by the post-office censor?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have been unable to ascertain, but I do know that the post-office censor has been stopping the use of the mails to various publications, some of them socialistic, to be sure; but various publishers throughout the country have been complaining that the mails have been denied to them because what they publish is not satisfactory to the Postmaster General. Now, the question naturally arises as to whether too much information is going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to suit the authorities.

Mr. GORDON. I have noticed that there has been a little socialistic trend to some of the speeches printed in the RECORD. Does the gentleman know whether that has had anything to do with the stopping of it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know, but there is free speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on both sides of all questions, and all sides of every question, and that ought to go to the public. Members of Congress can here, and, perhaps, here only, speak fully and freely upon public questions. This is because of the limitations and censorship that prevail in other directions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one minute. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I think he ought to have a longer extension than that, because there are other gentlemen who would like to ask him questions. I ask that his time be extended five minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, if I can get the floor I can explain this thing in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It has been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not now being circulated through the mails.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should not be suppressed. It is the one great reliable vehicle of information by which Members can express themselves to their constituents and to the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the gentleman states that it is not being circulated through the mails. I assume that that is to save space in the transportation facilities. Does the gentleman's information disclose a statement that is being circulated that literally tons of printed matter containing speeches made by a Cabinet officer are now being circulated in the trenches in France?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have heard that one use of our aeroplanes was to carry material over Germany and drop it there.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is not for the use of Germany or Germans. This is for the use of American soldiers who will be at home to vote in 1920.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know that, but have heard that millions of speeches have recently been printed and are to be circulated. Soldiers may be getting some of them in anticipation of the election.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman know that the reason for the suspension of the printing of the full number of copies of the daily RECORD is because of the shortage of the kind and quality of white print paper that is used for that publication, and does he not know that recently a new supply has been secured, and that now the back numbers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are being sent out?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is true that will help to explain the situation, but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Government Printing Office is running full tilt printing all kinds of publications for the departments and sending out more than the average Member of Congress can comprehend.

Mr. WALSH. Just one further question. Are not these highly intelligent communities which the gentleman has mentioned—Philadelphia, Texas, and New York——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman had better include Boston.

Mr. WALSH. And Boston and Cape Cod, these places that the gentleman mentions as having been deprived of this publication, are they not getting along pretty well without it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They may have gotten along very well, but I wish to say that some inquiries have come from the vicinity of Cape Cod as to why the RECORD did not appear with the daily objections of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Kansas asserts that tons of the speeches of a certain Cabinet officer are going over to our soldiers in France. Can the gentleman explain, when we can not get letters or packages to the soldiers in France, how this kind of literature is enabled to go there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not sure that this is a postal question. The gentleman from Iowa raises the important point that the post office is involved in this proposition. It may be or may not be. It is true that the post office does have time and facilities to deliver a great variety of speeches. If rumor be true, one of them is by a former governor of New York, which got into the RECORD a few days ago under conditions described here yesterday. It was a partisan speech by a vigorous Democrat.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, the explanation of this much ado about nothing consists in the fact that the paper on which the daily RECORD is printed is a 35-pound quality of paper not used for printing anything else in the Government Printing Office. It is paper that is tough but very light.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It needs to be tough. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNHART. It has to be tough. [Laughter.] It is contracted for by the year, and by reason of the very severe storms and railway blockade the shipment of paper has been tied up on railway sidings. The Government Printing Office and the Public Printer came before the Committee on Printing with the proposition that either we should run out of paper entirely and have to suspend the publication of the RECORD altogether or stop printing that part that went out by mail from Washington, until the blockade was broken. The blockade has been broken, the delayed paper is coming in, and the RECORDS are now going out day after day. The daily RECORD is being printed in numerical order and is being sent out as rapidly as possible.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD printed on the same kind of paper as are the President's addresses?

Mr. BARNHART. No; this paper for the temporary RECORD is a paper used for this purpose only.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do not they use the same kind of paper for the addresses of certain Cabinet officers now being widely circulated?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know, but think not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it true that hundreds of thousands of those addresses are being circulated and that they find paper for that purpose?

Mr. BARNHART. The Bulletin is printed on a heavy quality of paper of which the Government has an abundance, but we could not use it for the RECORD on account of the great bulk resultant.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Might not the suspension of the RECORD, which the gentleman refers to, have a very beneficent effect on the committee by curtailing debate on the floor of the House and elsewhere? [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNHART. My friend from Michigan is frequently right, and I think he is in this case.

The Clerk read as follows:

For equipment, material, and supplies for distribution of public documents, $750.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that this item is for the distribution of public documents, and it seems that public documents, if printed, should be distributed. Of course, complaint is occasionally made if the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not sent out containing the debates and proceedings of Congress, and I think perhaps the criticism offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], that the RECORD had not been sent out, was in this instance well taken, but the reason for its suspension has been given by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART]. It happens that during the period that the publication of the RECORD was suspended during the last two weeks certain criticisms were directed from the floor of the House at certain governmental activities at a place called Hog Island; and it is a shame that the people of Pennsylvania were deprived of learning what had been said here about those activities and how they impressed the Members of this House. And so, in view of what has been said by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], I am sure that the gentleman from Pennsylvania rejoices that his constituents and the constituents of his distinguished colleagues from that great Commonwealth are not longer to be kept in darkness as to what we in the American Congress think of the disclosures that have come from investigation of the governmental activities at that very busy and well-known point.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma motion. It is true the Hog Island shipyard is being built near Philadelphia. It is being constructed by the Government, or by contractors acting under direction of the Shipping Board, and is destined to be the greatest shipbuilding plant of the country. It is located on the Delaware River, where all that is hoped for it may be easily realized. For whatever scandal attaches to the work thus far, Philadelphia is not responsible. Whatever Philadelphia has done in furnishing men and material is highly creditable and as patriotic as the gentleman from Massachusetts could desire. For whatever is discreditable I shall have to refer the gentleman from Massachusetts to the "big brains" from New York and Boston, who secured the contracts and who may advise him as to "the ways that are dark."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all branches of the government of the District of Columbia shall be considered a governmental establishment for the purposes of section 7 of the deficiency appropriation act approved October 6, 1917.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Kentucky a question, whether there has been any provision or likely to be made with reference to facilities for the Federal Board for Vocational Education?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that when we finish the reading of the bill I propose to ask unanimous consent to return to page 3 for the purpose of inserting a provision making $3,095 of their funds available for payment of rent here in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, on page 75 there was a point of order pending, interposed by myself, to the first paragraph under the heading "Department of Agriculture." I desire to withdraw that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws his point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 3 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment after line 25, as follows.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to return to page 3 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Page 3, after line 25, insert the following:

"Federal Board for Vocational Education: Not to exceed $3,395 of the appropriation contained in section 7 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education, etc.,' approved February 23, 1917, shall be available for the rental of quarters in the District of Columbia for the said board from the date of its organization until June 30, 1918."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9867, the urgent deficiency bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not the Chair will put them en grosse. [After a pause.] The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossement and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOUSING OF SHIPBUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I present for printing under the rule a conference report on the bill (H. R. 8389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improve, or unimproved land, houses, and buildings, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address which I delivered to a gathering of Federal employees on Friday night last.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address he delivered last Friday night to Government clerks. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman has made so many speeches on the subject of the Government clerks that I would like to know in what respect this differs from the others and whether it justifies printing in the RECORD.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not believe it would enlighten the gentleman from Illinois. It might enlighten other Members.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. MILLER of Washington, from the 20th to the 26th of February, for the purpose of making patriotic addresses.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, at the request of Mr. ALMON, for three days, on account of important official business.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman will withhold that for a moment. I would like to send a bill to conference.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no objection, but I was requested by the majority leader to adjourn the House without the consideration of unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. WEBB. This is not an ordinary unanimous-consent request. I want to send a bill to conference, and I know the majority leader has no objection, in view of the demand for this legislation.

The SPEAKER. What is the request?

Mr. WEBB. That the bill H. R. 6361, known as the soldiers and sailors' civil rights bill, be taken from the Speaker's table, that the Senate amendments be disagreed to, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WEBB, Mr. CARLIN, and Mr. VOLSTEAD.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, in order to begin the consideration of the railroad bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 19, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 19, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we are here petitioners before Thy throne. Day by day we meet obligations and responsibilities that we dare not meet alone, and we seek Thy guidance and blessing. We come to Thee with no complaint, but we come with the joy of being yet unsatisfied, of believing that Thou hast larger things for us in our individual life and in our Nation. We pray Thee to lead us on in the ever-unfolding plan of the Divine will until we shall see Thy purpose accomplished in all the earth. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WEBB, Mr. CARLIN, and Mr. VOLSTEAD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9867) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. I have a short memorial from the Montana Legislature, which is now in session, to the Congress of the United States. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

HELENA, MONT., February 16, 1918.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States assembled:

Whereas the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, meeting in extraordinary session in response to a proclamation of the governor calling this body together for the consideration of measures necessary to a successful prosecution of the war, among which, of primary importance, is a bill providing for loans at low rates of interest to needy farmers for the enhancement of agricultural production in the State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana hears with grave concern the reports from Washington of the intention of Congress to reduce a contemplated appropriation of $750,000 toward the completion of the Flathead Reservation irrigation project, in western Montana, to $250,000, and does hereby go on record as in favor of, and registers its wish for an appropriation of, $750,000 for said project; and it is further

Resolved, That a failure of the Congress of the United States to make such appropriation of $750,000 would be violative of the best interests of this Nation, a great discouragement to the farmers and to the farming interests of Montana, thereby resulting in decreased production in one of the most fertile sections of the State of Montana and, being prompted by a consideration for the best interests of this Nation and the State of Montana, demands favorable action by the United States Congress of an appropriation of $750,000 toward the completion of the Flathead Reservation irrigation project; and it is hereby ordered that a copy of this resolution be telegraphed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the United States Senate, with the recommendation that it be read before both bodies and referred to the proper committees.

J. F. O'CONNOR,
Speaker of House.
W. W. MCDOWELL,
President of Senate.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of the chamber of commerce of Riverside, Cal., remonstrating against any repeal of the advanced rates on second-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Connecticut State Branch of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, of New Haven, Conn., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of the Swedish Independent Club, of New Britain; of the Equal Franchise Club, of Middletown; and of sundry citizens of New Haven, Hartford, and Woodmont, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to ask a question that concerns what I think is a very important matter.

I am receiving letters from constituents in different parts of my State saying that they have not received a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD since the 1st day of February. I made inquiry and found that, in consequence of the shortage of paper—at least, that is the reason given—the sending of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD outside of the District of Columbia has been entirely discontinued. Mr. President, to me this is a very important matter. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is, I think, the only uncensored publication that we have at the present time, and certainly the people ought to have the privilege of reading it.

I presume there is a shortage of paper, perhaps to such an extent that some action of this kind becomes necessary unless a remedy is found; but, to my mind, there is a remedy in sight. I yesterday, through the mail, received the publication I hold in my hand. It is entitled "The Wholesale Prices from 1900 to 1916," printed. A great corps of high-salaried men have been traveling over the country formulating tables of wholesale price: from 1900 to nearly two years ago. The tables by the Department of Labor, one of the chief offenders in printing statistics of little account to anybody except to men engaged in collecting antiquarian literature, are absolutely worthless. Nobody reads them. If anybody does read them, they get no information, because the wholesale prices have changed enormously from 1916 to 1918. Yet we are spending, I do not know how much money—hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars annually—in publishing these books, which simply exploit some department or bureau of the Government, uselessly using up paper to such an extent that we find ourselves unable to secure paper enough to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the information of our constituents.

Mr President, I have before me a long list—I am not going to read it—of publications that are of very little account to the people of this country or to any interest of the Government. The title of the last one I am going to read. It is not a very large book. It is entitled "The Pirates of the Deep: A Story of the Squid and Octopus." Mr. President, in publishing that document, I do not know whether the Committee on Printing acted upon it or not, but the whole list of publications I have here are almost as unimportant as that; and we are printing all these books and documents and using up the paper at the Government Printing Office, and then we come to a point where the constituents of mine to whom I send the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and who are interested in it and who read it—many of them every word of it—write me that they have not received a copy since the 1st day of February.

Mr. President, I would like to have the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, which committee, I believe, is responsible for this order, to tell the Senate if he does not think that some means ought to be devised whereby the evil I complain of may be remedied.

Mr. PENROSE. Before the Senator from Utah goes on I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he would not be willing to except from the general tenor of his remarks a publication entitled "Through Costa Rica, the Magnificent, with a Motor Car."

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is one of them. I have in my list several others equally as absurd.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose it is contributory to the war.

Mr. PENROSE. It is contributory to the war, I expect.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Joint Committee on Printing asked for bids upon paper as usual for the coming year, and they were to be opened the latter part of January, the 25th, as I remember it. Ordinarily we have dozens of bids for the furnishing of paper such as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is printed upon. This year we received but one bid, and that bid was an irregular one and could not be accepted under the law. We purchase millions of pounds of that class of paper, and we find ourselves in this position: That we have men traveling over the country where there is a paper plant begging them to make paper similar to the paper that the Congressional Record is printed upon. It is absolutely impossible at present to secure paper sufficient to furnish more than 5,000 copes of the RECORD daily. We can not get it from any source that is known to any committee or to the trade itself.

Not only that, Mr. President, but we are required to pay over 100 per cent more than we have had to pay in the past for this kind of paper.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, is it not possible to stop the printing of some of these worthless books and documents and use that paper for the purpose of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. I am coming to that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad the Senator will touch on that point.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit one interruption? For instance, an exception might be made in this war crisis of the document entitled "Narcotic Plants and Stimulants of the Ancient Americans." [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, referring to the question as to whether we can stop the printing of a great many of the public documents that are printed to-day and that every Representative and every Senator knows ought not to be printed I will say that we are compelled to print so many of all public documents ordered. The documents that have been referred to by the Senator this morning are mostly departmental documents.

We appropriate so much money to each one of the departments of the Government for printing purposes. The Joint Committee on Printing have nothing whatever to say in relation to what shall or what shall not be printed by the departments; and of late the departments have not only spent all the money that has been appropriated for their use for printing, but we find them coming to Congress and asking that the same documents be printed as public documents. Thank fortune, so far we have withheld favorable action upon such requests, but the pressure is becoming greater and greater every year, and if the Senate and House are not on their guard we will begin to print them as public documents.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are constantly asking us to do it, are they not?

Mr. SMOOT. Every day we are asked to do it. The list that was presented by the Senator from New Hampshire I hope he will put in the RECORD. It is only just a bare percentage of what is going on in the departments. I could bring into the Senate Chamber a pile of documents that would block the aisles. They never ought to have been printed, and the practice ought to be stopped.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks these documents are read? Are they ever read by anyone?

Mr. SMOOT. Not one in a hundred. Not only that, but I now say to the Senate of the United States, if they want to stop this wicked waste of public money, pass the printing bill that we have had before the Senate for the last eight years; but because there are heads of some of the departments of our Government opposed to it, because they think it limits their power to print everything that they desire, and they come to Congress and appeal to Senators and Representatives to vote against it and prevent its passage. So far they have had power enough to do it.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if the printing bill has not been passed by the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator we passed the bill through the Senate twice, and I think it was passed once during the latter days of a session in the House of Representatives, but at no session of Congres have we been able yet to pass it in both Houses.

Mr. KENYON. When it passes the Senate it does not pass the House, and when it passes the House it does not pass the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. That has been the history for eight years, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. And that bill is now in the House?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill now is in the House, and we hope that it will receive consideration by the House first, and if it is considered by the House, as far as I am concerned, if it is within my power, I am going to compel the Senate to vote upon the question as to whether it will take the bill up for consideration.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator will have plenty of help in getting the bill up.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say, if the bill had become a law four years ago, there would have been a saving of nearly a million dollars a year, and with paper the price that it is to-day, we would save $2,500,000 per annum. That is in printing alone, and stop to think that under the present law all these worthless documents have to be sent to all the designated libraries of the country, and at the end of the year they are returned to Washington and they are piled up and sold as old paper, not a hundred thousand copies of them, but millions of copies of them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I came in while the Senator was speaking, and he may have touched on the matter I want to mention. I wanted to ask the Senator what his opinion was as to the vast amount of printed material which is being sent out by the newly organized bureaus to newspapers in all parts of the country? Is it not a fact that there are publication bureaus that are maintained at the expense of thousands of dollars a month for the mere purpose of sending out a sort of newspaper propaganda?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says thousands of dollars a month. I want to say to the Senator that it is thousands of dollars daily. I understand there is one bureau that spends $5,000 a day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator what that bureau is?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Creel's bureau. I have not examined into the details of the expense of that bureau, but I have been informed by men who say they have that it is costing the Government of the United States nearly $5,000 a day. I think it ought to be investigated if that is the case.

But coming back to the RECORD, this order never would have been issued if it had not been absolutely necessary. I am in hopes that we can find some of the paper plants in the United States that can make this class of paper and will make it for the Government in sufficient quantities so that we can at least publish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. But I will say to the Senate now, and particularly to the Senator from New Hampshire, that it became absolutely necessary to limit the issue to 5,000 copies daily.

Mr. President, there is only one other thing that I want to say at this time. I want to appeal to the Senate that in the future please do not ask that newspaper articles be put in the RECORD. Please keep the RECORD just as clear from all matter outside of what occurs upon the floor of the Senate as it is possible to do. I know that Senators do not realize that every printed page in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when paper was at its ordinary price cost the Government of the United States $30 and some odd cents, and to-day the cost is over $50. We hardly stop to think of that, but we ought, at least now that we can not get sufficient paper from any part of the United States for the purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in justice to the Senate itself I ought to say that a large proportion of the documents that I have before me have been printed by the departments and not by order of the Senate or by the House of Representatives. To my mind the extent to which paper is being used and the funds of the Government exhausted by the departments in printing documents that are of no earthly account is approaching a scandal, and the Committee on Appropriations ought this year to scan very carefully the appropriations that are made to the departments for that purpose, and see if we can not in that way make a saving sufficient at least to let us have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for circulation among the people of the country who want to examine it. I quite concur in the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah, as he was about closing his remarks, that we ought to save the space of the RECORD also by keeping out of it as much extraneous matter as possible.

I do not know how many pages the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the last session of Congress will make when it is bound, but I venture to say that it will be ten times as many as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD had 10 years ago. We are swelling that printed volume year by year; it takes paper to print it; and as a result of these extravagances, as I look upon it, we are face to face with the fact to-day that a constituent of any Senator who wants to see the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order to ascertain what Congress is doing is denied that privilege on the ground that the paper is being exhausted in other directions, and that we can not get a sufficient supply with which to print the record of our daily doings as a Congress. We hear the cry that "pitiless publicity" is something the people have a right to demand, and then we close the only avenue the people have of knowing what their servants in the two Houses of Congress are doing.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I quite agree in general with my colleagues on the Committee on Printing. I think there has been no lack of diligence on the part of the Committee on Printing in reference to their action in recommending documents to be printed. I do not know of any useless document in favor of the printing of which the committee has reported at all. In fact, we have been very careful to scan everything submitted to the committee, and to avoid printing anything that did not seem to be absolutely meritorious in every respect and to pertain to matters pending before Congress. There has been no waste in that regard.

But I agree also with the statement that the printing bill ought to have been passed by Congress. It would have meant an enormous economy, a saving of something like a million dollars a year. That matter has been before the Senate. The Senate is not to blame, perhaps, although we ought to have gotten to that bill before and ought to have passed it. I hope that will yet be done.

The matter of the RECORD, however, is quite important, and I have myself been getting inquiries from people who were on my mailing list for the RECORD, who want to know why it is not coming to them. I have had to explain to them the reason. In that connection I think it is fair to give the Senate just what has taken place. On January 30, 1918, I wrote the Public Printer as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
January 30, 1918.

The PUBLIC PRINTER,
Government Printing Office.

DEAR SIR: The committee has received numerous inquiries as to when the bound edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress will be completed, together with the index, and made available for the use of Members of Congress. The early completion of this RECORD is most essential for the use of Congress, and I believe it ought not to be delayed any longer than is absolutely necessary.

Kindly advise me when the bound edition will be ready, together with the index.

Respectfully, yours,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman.

On February 1 the Public Printer replied:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
February 1, 1918.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your inquiry of January 30, 1918, as to when the bound edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the first session, Sixty-fifth Congress, will be completed, together with the index, and made available for the use of Members of Congress, the following is respectfully submitted:

Owing to shortage of stock (48-inch rolls 35-pound stock) by failure of delivery, due to transportation, the bound edition was stopped in order that the stock on hand could be used for the daily issue only, and for no other purpose. There is now in transit more than 200 rolls of this stock, part from the Champion Coated Paper Co., of Ohio, and part from the Bryant Paper Co., of Michigan. In relation to these deliveries every effort has been made to have same delivered. The matter was and is still being pushed to the utmost with the car service of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who are in charge of transportation.

The orders now on the road date from December 4, 1917, to the Champion Paper Co., a total tonnage of 500,000 pounds, of which less than 100,000 pounds have been delivered. Orders have been placed with the Seaman Co. for the Bryant Mill of a total tonnage of 500,000 pounds. Of the latter but 40,000 pounds, or one carload, has been received. Information has reached me that five carloads are in transit. Latest advices are that these cars are held up at Sandusky, Ohio.

On hand in the Government Printing Office at this time there are 40 rolls, about a three days' run of a medium-sized RECORD.

Under the circumstances, unless we receive some of this tonnage now under way, the publication of the daily RECORD will be jeopardized, although I am in hopes that stock in transit will be received.

As soon as sufficient stock is in this office the bound edition will be completed in about 15 days. There is now completed six and one-half volumes of the bound edition, with one and one-half volumes, including the index, to complete the edition.

May I suggest this thought for your consideration if stock is not received: The printing of but sufficient copies of the daily RECORD to meet the wants of the Washington deliveries. Other deliveries to be made up when sufficient stock is at hand.

Respectfully, yours,
CORNELIUS FORD,
Public Printer.

On February 5 I replied as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
February 5, 1918.

The PUBLIC PRINTER,
Government Printing Office.

DEAR SIR: I am pleased to acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 1, 1918, in response to my inquiry concerning the delay in printing the bound edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and advising me as to your difficulty in obtaining the paper stock for the use of the Government Printing Office.

I am sure the Joint Committee on Printing will be very glad to cooperate with you in every way possible to obtain sufficient paper for the printing of the necessary Government publications. If we can be of any assistance to you in this regard at any time do not hesitate to call upon us.

I think your suggestion in regard to printing only a sufficient number of copies of the daily RECORD for official distribution in Washington for the time being is a good one, and unless the delivery of sufficient paper to assure the printing of the RECORD is now in sight I would suggest that you take the matter up immediately with the committee as to whether to temporarily discontinue the printing of the daily RECORD for outside distribution. I believe it would also be well to temporarily discontinue the printing of all other publications that are not immediately necessary, the paper for which could be used for more essential publications. If you have any suggestions or recommendations to make in this regard I am sure the committee would be very glad to consider them.

The printing of necessary publications ought to be safeguarded in every possible way, and at the expense of such publications as may be discontinued for the time being.

Respectfully, yours,
(Signed) DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman.

It will be noted that on February 5 we advised the Public Printer to discontinue the publication of all other matters not necessary, and, if the stock was so low as to require it, to discontinue the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for delivery outside of Washington. On February 7 he came to see me about this matter, pointing out that with the stock on hand it looked as if every day we might not have enough even to print a sufficient number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Congress. We discussed that matter, and he then wrote me as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, February 7, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Relative to my talk with you regarding curtailment of the number of copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and in answer to your esteemed favor of the 5th instant, wherein you suggest the matter of temporarily discontinuing the printing of the daily RECORD for outside distribution, I respectfully submit the following:

The wisdom of printing sufficient copies of the daily RECORD for Washington City deliveries has enabled the Public Printer to get out the daily RECORD for the past few days, although but 5,000 copies were printed.

There is now on hand but 28 rolls of this stock available for RECORD use, and if the RECORD on any day is exceptionally large this amount will be used up. However, a conference between the Director General of Railroads and myself yesterday will, I am in hopes, relieve the situation. There are in transit 214 rolls from the Champion Coated Paper Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, which have been en route since December 26, 1917. There are also en route 188 rolls from Kalamazoo, Mich., since January 14. At the conference yesterday all information was furnished the Director General and a promise to move this stock and get same into this office was made. It was also promised that all other stock would receive immediate consideration and orders were issued to that effect.

Under the circumstances, I am in hopes that within a few days we will be able to print the regular edition of the RECORD with sufficient stock on hand to complete the issues which have been run short.

In relation to temporarily discontinuing the printing of all other publications that are not immediately necessary, orders along that line have been issued and all employees in charge of the work have been notified.

Respectfully, yours, CORNELIUS FORD,
Public Printer.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Joint Committee on Printing,
Washington, D. C.

So that is the cause of the discontinuance of the printing of the RECORD for outside distribution; and, as Senators will see, it was plainly necessary for that step to be taken; but we are assured by the Public Printer that the paper stock is in transit, and surely it ought to be here within the next few days. The copies which should have been printed and distributed will be made good and the distribution will take place in the regular order as soon as we have the stock on hand with which to print a sufficient number of copies of the RECORD.

I put this correspondence in the RECORD in order that it may explain the whole situation.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has called the attention of the Senate to this abuse, which is rapidly reaching the proportions of a scandal. I have objected frequently on the floor of the Senate to making the RECORD look more like a copybook from a telegraph office or a small country post office than a dignified legislative record, owing to the apparently irrepressible habit of some Senators to have inserted in the RECORD letters from obscure constituents expressing their views on different matters. I have also objected, to the point of making myself objectionable, to the practice of having frivolous and ephemeral articles published as public documents. I have taken the liberty to protest when the chairman of the Committee on Printing has had printed nearly every utterance of Mr. David Lubin and other articles of similar importance.

The situation, Mr. President, has reached a point, so far as Pennsylvania is concerned, when I am having these documents returned to me. Only yesterday I received a letter from a very prominent gentleman in Philadelphia, calling my attention to a document which had been sent to him by a Government department, and expressing his astonishment that a document of such useless character should be sent to anyone of average intelligence. Upon another occasion, a few days prior to the communication referred to, I received a protest from a manufacturer, calling my attention to the publications of the Department of Commerce, Bureau of Census, which department is sending broadcast through Pennsylvania reports of the census of manufactures, dated 1914. Surely——

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator a copy of it there?

Mr. PENROSE. I have a copy here in my hand of the report relating to petroleum refining, dated 1914. Surely there can be no very great value to this cumbersome compilation of figures when conditions have changed as rapidly since 1914 as they did change for a hundred years prior to 1914.

Here is one of my most recent communications in this connection:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 5, 1918.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR PENROSE: My company has received in to-day's mail a report headed "Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, Sam. L. Rogers, Director, Census of Manufactures: 1914, Pennsylvania."

I can hardly conceive of a more useless expenditure of time and money than is represented by this pamphlet. Coming at this time, when economy is the watchword of the day, it is most discouraging to have placed before one such a concrete example of inefficiency.

The report, of course, goes into the waste-paper basket, as it has no place in our files.

Yours, truly, SYDNEY THAYER,
Secretary Henry Bower Chemical Manufacturing Co.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina and Mr. THOMAS. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further petitions or memorials, reports of committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is detained from the Senate by illness, I report from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments the bill (S. 3778) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for an Assistant Secretary of War," approved March 5, 1890, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 282) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 3439) for the relief of certain homestead and desert-land entrymen, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 284) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2975) for the relief of Katherine Macdonald, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 283) thereon.

THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 205, submitted by Mr. SIMMONS on the 14th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress, to send for persons, books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

GUARANTEED PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. GORE. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) to amend section 14 of the food-control act by increasing the guaranteed minimum price of wheat for the crop of 1918 from $2 to $2.50 per bushel, with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 285) thereon.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to say as to that report that I am a member of the Agricultural Committee, but the joint resolution was taken up for final action while I was not present. I do not want it to be understood that the committee is unanimous in making that report. I think some of the members of the committee have not made up their minds as to the measure. I will inquire if the chairman has presented the report as the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. GORE. Oh, no; I made no reference to the vote by which it prevailed in the committee.

Mr. KENYON. I shall not feel bound by the report of the committee when the matter comes before the Senate.

Mr. GORE. I understand the Senator from Iowa reserves the right to oppose the measure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma whether the joint resolution he has just reported provides for a minimum price to the farmer?

Mr. GORE. In answer I will say that it does change existing law. The existing law provides that the minimum guaranteed by statute is to be applied at the principal interior primary markets. The joint resolution just reported amends existing law by making the basic market the farmers' local market or the local elevator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate now on this matter, but when the joint resolution comes up I hope the Senator will bear in mind that principle—that the object to be attained in fixing a minimum price, as I understood the object when the original law was passed, was to increase the production of wheat in the country by guaranteeing a minimum price to the man that raised the wheat; but the application of the old law has failed of that purpose. Fixing certain primary markets in certain parts of the country and not fixing them in other great sections of the country gave a certain minimum price to the farmers in one place and denied it to the farmers in other places, and in those other places it cost the farmer more to produce the wheat than in the sections where he got the benefit of the law. The starting point of fixing or guaranteeing a minimum price should be—and if I understand the statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma, that is the purpose and will be the effect of the joint resolution which he has just reported—the basis and starting point of the prices which will be paid for wheat and for flour ought to be the price which is received by the farmer who produces the wheat.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat will he permit me to suggest to him that the law fixing the price of wheat at $2 a bushel was made by its terms to apply only to the crop produced in the year 1918. That has not yet been produced, of course. This joint resolution amends that law. It has no application, and the law that we have already passed has no application, to the price of the 1917 crop that we are now using. The existing price of wheat now was fixed not by virtue of a statute of Congress but by the Food Administration, by reason of its power to control the price on account of buying such a large amount of wheat for the allies in this country. So that the price that exists at the present time was not fixed by virtue of a definite statute, and this has no application to existing prices.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona will state his point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to interrupt the proceedings long enough to introduce a bill. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to introduce a bill. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us have the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further reports of committees, bills and joint resolutions are in order.

GUARANTEED PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9867. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3752, the unfinished business.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I have been delighted with the announcement by the President that hereafter there will be no secret diplomacy, and his policy of addressing Congress from time to time in the open forum of the world meets with a cordial and enthusiastic response in every democracy. This new departure of our President marks an epoch in world history, and its future beneficent consequences can not at the moment be accurately measured. The policy is one of necessity which applies not only to diplomatic relations with a foreign power but with even greater force to what transpires within our own borders. I advert briefly to the subject because I deprecate the undemocratic and un-American suppression and repression which characterized the first months of our entrance into war, and which yet obtain in some circles. Last year the slightest difference of opinion, earnestly and patriotically expressed, even an embarrassing inquiry, was met with the epithets "disloyal" and "pro-German." The most just criticism was answered by denunciation and anathema. Recently the epithets "pro-German" and "disloyal" may have been exchanged for "partisan."

The idea last year seemed prevalent, and to find sanction with various individuals and in a large part of the press, that absolute silence and submission without complaint to any deficiency or injustice were the only measure of loyalty. If any individual, with highest motive, sought to lay bare a wrong, forthwith he was charged with lending aid and comfort to the enemy. I will not subscribe to the doctrine that either in peace or in war, legitimate, honest, and conscientious suggestion or criticism may not be indulged. This Government yet belongs to all its people, and they are entitled to know not only how, diplomatically, the Government deals with the nations of the earth, but to know as well the internal policies which yet control the Republic situated within the boundaries of the United States; and beyond this, they are entitled to know what intimately concerns their property and their lives.

Disloyalty and treason can not thrive in the light. Neither can incompetence, that strong ally of failure. Official suppression and concealment are as vicious as the secret diplomacy and private bargaining which President Wilson so justly condemns. The pretense that the people can not be told the truth is the artifice of incompetent men who are afraid to face the test of public scrutiny. No man, of course, is entitled unjustly to criticize nor to indulge in unbridled license of expression. The real test of criticism is whether it is just or unjust. If consciously unjust, it should subject him who utters it to the contempt of all. If just, it vindicates itself. When the time comes that Members of Congress, the supposedly popular branch of the Government, must refrain from utterances designed to render patriotic service, because those utterances are at variance with the views of either official or majority, the end has come to our democracy, and the Congress no longer performs a useful service to the people.

The various recent investigations have been of incalculable benefit. They have remedied some concrete deficiencies, but they have performed the fundamental service of finally permitting a modicum of free expression. I will not refer to the investigations of the Military Committee, of which you have heard so much, and concerning which you are well able to judge. I happen to be a member of the Commerce Committee which conscientiously has been engaged in the endeavor, by investigation, to aid in the shipping problem of the Nation. In the course of that investigation many constructive things have been accomplished, and some things have been unearthed which required the bright light of publicity to remedy them. The chairman of the committee and the leader upon the other side of this Chamber, in 24 hours, brought about with one of the large shipping yards of the country the solution of the housing question—the most important question connected with the building of ships. They did this after it had been testified before the committee, by one of the best known and most highly respected of our shipbuilders, that he had been striving for many months to accomplish the result which they accomplished in as many hours.

In one of the contracts entered into by the Government—that with the American International Co.—a state of affairs beggaring description has been developed. The evidence demonstrates a wild saturnalia of extravagance, a brilliant phantasmagoria of patriotic pretense. And the pity and the shame of it are that those who, with a cheerful and almost studied disregard for every principle of economy, are wasting the money of taxpayers are some of the great captains of industry of the Nation.

I have read recently the utterances of some of those responsible for those conditions, and, singularly enough, they unctiously express as great patriots their sorrow that such disclosures should be made public, and, as lugubriously they shake their heads, they exclaim that publicity of the delinquencies is giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I wanted to ask him if he thought that a man by telling of a swindle on the Government was giving aid and comfort to the enemy, just how the act of the man who swindled the Government ought to be classified?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It is just this policy which has grown up in the last few months that would preclude ever publicity concerning the man who had swindled the Government, because nothing must be said, nothing must be written, nothing must be told during this crisis that somebody may think reflects upon somebody else in official position.

Mr. REED. I think I was unfortunate in making myself understood. The point I am trying to get from the Senator is this: Assuming it to be true that to tell the fact that the Government has been swindled gives aid and comfort to the enemy, then what is the character of the act of the swindler? How does his act affect the enemy? Is it not somewhat worse to do the thing than it is to tell about it?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator's query, Mr. President, points the moral.

Inefficiency, incompetency, and worse flourish in darkness. Truth and publicity are the remedy and the corrective. Secrecy between a people and their government is the most mischievous element in national life. Lloyd-George in a recent speech told England that a nation which is not virile enough to hear the truth about itself is not a first-class power. Clemenceau said to France that he believed self-governing people fight better when they have a full knowledge of the actual situation. Ours is the only democracy which pursued the policy—I hope now almost at an end—of fearing its people and considering them so lightly that it dared not take them into its confidence.

The man who sits supine and silent with a knowledge of wrongs requiring exposure and detection, of inefficiency necessitating correction—the man who, convinced that acts or policies retard our success and endanger the lives of our loved ones, and yet advocates these policies and acts—these are the disloyal Americans, and these are the men who really aid and comfort the enemy.

I am not speaking now in behalf of any particular criticism or even for criticism itself. I merely protest against the set phrases "pro-German," "disloyal," and "partisan," which have been so indiscriminately applied to the men patriotically differing from those who assume themselves to be the sole exponents of the thought of the Nation. I have no desire to fill the rôle of critic. At best, that rôle brings dubious fame and rouses bitter resentment, and unjust criticism long continued reacts and destroys the critic.

> Some first for wits, and then for poets passed,
> Turn critics next, and prove plain fools at last.

May the day have gone by forever when an American citizen shall be precluded by fear of denunciation and the epithet of "disloyalty" from expressing his honest and his patriotic sentiments.

Recently I ran across the following jingle of Mr. Montague:

> There's a shortage of corn and a shortage of wheat,
> A shortage of fish and a shortage of meat,
> A shortage of sugar, a shortage of shoes,
> A shortage of ships and a shortage of crews,
> A shortage of coal and a shortage of coke,
> A shortage of pine and of spruce and of oak,
> And we can't help believe, from the trend of events,
> That there's, somewhere or other, a shortage of sense.
>
> There'll be shortage of cash when the taxes are due.
> Maybe shortage of work in a fortnight or two;
> There'll soon be a general shortage of light,
> And a shortage of cheer through the dark winter night.
> There'll be shortage of patience to bear all our ills,
> Yet there never will be any shortage of bills.
> But still through the darkness we'll grumblingly grope;
> For as yet there is not any shortage of hope.
>
> We'll grumblingly grope, as we mentioned before,
> And pray for the day of a shortage of war.
> We'll kick and complain and we'll murmur and moan;
> At every new shortage we'll grievously groan.
> But even though everything looks mighty blue,
> We know all the while that we'll see the thing through.
> We may be quite fussed, but you'll please to observe,
> That we've never had ever a shortage of nerve.

Rather humourously, in a small way, the writer endeavors to depict the American mental attitude of to-day. We will grumble and growl and fuss about the difficulties in our path and the obstacles we encounter. We will feel a bit of irritation now and then at restrictive measures, but underlying all, there will never be a loss of American pluck or of the American spirit which has characterized our Nation since its birth. Whatever may be our faults of expression, however the act of the moment may trouble or annoy, America, with spirit unafraid and undismayed, a Nation yet undefeated, will play the game and see it through, until American arms are triumphant and American victory won.

The so-called railroad measure under discussion involves not alone present governmental financial relations in respect to the railroads, but is of far-reaching and transcendent importance in determining what our future policy shall be.

I can not agree with the rate of compensation prescribed by the bill. I am in full accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Iowa upon the floor of the Senate and so ably set forth in his minority report. Not only do I agree with the Senator from Iowa that the compensation to be accorded the railroads of the Nation for their use during the war is unfair and unjust, and, because of the crisis, indefensible, but I would now take the inevitable next step in Government control of our railroads, and do whatever might be essential to make that Government control permanent Government ownership, or, at least, leave the way open so that immediately upon the termination of the war we might follow to its logical conclusion what already we have partly done.

The Senator from Iowa has demonstrated so completely the injustice of the terms of the present bill in fixing the rate of compensation to be paid to the railroads that perhaps it is supererogation to say more in concurrence or confirmation; but, at the risk of being prolix and repetitive, I wish to record my condemnation of the too generous treatment of the railroads of the country at the expense of our taxpayers.

Specifically, I speak now only of important phases, eliminating detail. The bill provides that the President shall make agreements with the railroad companies guaranteeing incomes to them equivalent to the average annual railway operating income for three years ending June 30, 1917. What this means in dollars and cents to the people of this country must be understood by them in order that they may know its iniquity. It means that the interest on the outstanding bonds of the railroads will be paid in accordance with the interest rates now fixed; it means, in addition, that upon the stock of the railroads of the country will be paid by the Government of the United States something in excess of 8 per cent per annum; it means that this percentage in excess of 8 per cent per annum is paid upon all the stock of all the railroads; it means that this percentage—and I am speaking only of the minimum—shall be paid by the people of the United States not only upon the legitimate issues of the stock of railroad corporations, but upon every issue of stock that has been illegitimately issued; it means that upon every watered issue that has been wrung from the people of the United States in the past, that represents not a dollar of value nor a penny of real investment, we pay in excess of 8 per cent per annum; it means that during this time of crisis and of peril, when the supreme sacrifice is demanded of those we love, and the maximum service from those who remain at home, that we pay upon watered stock, estimated at almost 50 per cent of the total stock of these corporations—stock representing nothing but the greed and the avarice of railroad magnates—this huge dividend. And that the amount of dividend may be understood I read again the table of percentage which will thus be paid to the railroads of the country, quoted last week by the Senator from Iowa, and which stands here uncontradicted and unchallenged:

The justification for this procedure has been voiced most eloquently and ably by the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Minnesota, the Senator from Arkansas, and the Senator from Ohio. They assert, rather persuasively and plausibly, that the railroad companies earned this income in the three years preceding the time of their seizure by the Government, and that, therefore, these earnings for the three years prior furnish a just mode of determining their compensation. This would not be so in time of peace, and in time of war it is much less so. Upon what theory is the maximum of sacrifice demanded of all the rest of the Nation and the maximum of compensation accorded to our railroads? Not only this, but the years that have been taken for the determination of the remuneration of the railroads constitute two years that were the most profitable during their whole existence. It is quite true that 1915 was not so profitable, but 1916 and 1917 were the most remunerative in their history. When the Congress dealt with the excess-profits tax its basis of computation was upon three prewar years—1911, 1912, and 1913; and if any three years were to be adopted as measuring railroad earnings it would seem to be more just that three prewar years be taken, as in the case of the excess-profits tax, rather than two war years of maximum and extraordinary profit. But I insist that such a mode of determining what shall be paid to the railroads is at this time grossly unjust to the entire taxpaying public.

A fair return, of course, should and must be paid, but in time of war the highest possible profit ought not to be paid the railroads. Men go to the trenches to-day for $30 per month, men whose earning capacity in the past three years has been infinitely greater than that sum. We do not stop to inquire how much these human beings have earned in the past three years. We say to them, "Your country demands you. You must, if necessary, die, and your country considers not at all your earning capacity of the past nor your possibilities of the future." In the name of patriotism we send these young men, as is just, to fight the battles of the Republic. We give them the pittance of $30 per month. If any man upon this floor suggested that their earning capacity for the past three years should be the measure of their compensation in this time of crisis he would be laughed to scorn. When we deal, however, with the great railroad companies of the Nation we do not ask ourselves what is the minimum the Nation should pay and what sacrifice should those who own the railroad companies make in time of war, but we gravely and seriously base our computations upon the highest earning power of the companies during the very war in which we are now engaged. Moreover, these earnings for two years of the period from which we compute the amount to be paid were accumulated in part by gross neglect on the part of the railroad companies of their tracks and their equipment. I read from an epitomized newspaper report of Interstate Commerce Commissioner R. C. McChord to Director General McAdoo, published the day before yesterday:

> Thousands of crippled freight cars, accumulated through the winter because of gross neglect of railroads in making repairs, occupy miles of tracks in eastern rail centers and are largely responsible for car shortage and traffic congestion, according to a report made to-day by Charles C. McChord, Interstate Commerce Commissioner, to Director General McAdoo.
> These reports, based on first-hand investigations by a corps of trained inspectors, cover the six weeks' period since the Government assumed operation of the railroads and indicate that one of the most critical ills of rail transportation under private management was the sidetracking of cars needing repairs. * * *
> These cars could have been repaired quickly during the winter if the railroads had made proper preparations for covered repair tracks, according to railroad administration officials.

Again, the payment of this vast sum to the railroads proceeds as if the railroads were efficiently and thoroughly performing their function, but, it must be remembered, they were utterly unable to perform their tasks and that it was only after they had demonstrated conclusively their inability as public carriers to render the proper service to the public and to the Government that the Government finally seized them. We pay, therefore, not alone a grossly excessive sum, but we pay as well substantially for services unperformed and for a work which, admittedly, the railroads could not do.

The compensation prescribed by the bill is fixed presumably upon the theory that that amount would be earned by the railroads if they had continued their services and if they had never been taken by the Government. It indeed has been asserted that the income of the various companies during the period of the war would have been equally as great as that during the three years preceding June last, and that, therefore, the amount the measure allows to them is reasonable and just. But this is not so. The railroads broke down. They were unable to perform their work. They could not meet war's emergency. If the Government had not taken them, with war's limitations upon them, they could not possibly have earned during the remaining period of the war any such income as they were able to make prior to our entry into the war. The burden was too great for them. They shifted that burden to the Government. The Government now assumes all of the burden of the transportation companies and performs all their tasks—tasks which, admittedly, the transportation companies could not perform, and then the Government generously pays the corporations for the burden it thus assumes. Imagine a going concern transacting a profitable business. Suddenly an emergency arises which this concern can not meet and it breaks down and no longer performs its business or its functions. You, who alone are capable of carrying on its business, assume control. All the risks, all the burden, and all the expenditures you assume. Would you for the use of that concern which could not perform its task, which surrendered to you its function, pay as rental substantially the highest income that had been earned by this broken-down concern during its prosperity and success? Not only do we permit these railroads to capitalize our generosity—and many of them do capitalize it by issuing against land grants and our gifts bonds and stocks—but by this bill we pay interest upon our own generosity and munificence.

Nearly every Senator upon this floor has gone to his constituents and has asked them—those well-to-do and those of slender store—to invest in liberty bonds. We have pleaded in the name of patriotism and in the name of the common ties that bind us for the perpetuity of our institutions, and that our ideals may yet exist, that our people lend to the Government in its crisis their lifetime savings at 4 per cent interest. Nobly the response has been made by high and low, rich and poor, alike. Four per cent upon liberty bonds to the patriotic, to those who answer their country's call. More than double 4 per cent—three and four times that sum in reality—to railroad owners who in the Nation's crisis have been unable to perform their task.

The men who have loaned the Nation their savings in liberty bonds are quite content with the interest prescribed by the Government. You do not ask them if their money in the past three years has earned 6 or 8 or 10 per cent. And you do not inquire whether they, during the course of this war, could upon the very money they have given the Government receive returns of 6, 8, 10, or 12 per cent. We all know that in many parts of the country to-day interest rates are such that double the amount paid by liberty bonds could be obtained for the money the people have placed in these bonds. We are not interested in any such facts as these when the ordinary citizen is concerned; but, with a gentleness and a tenderness that do infinite credit to our benevolence and generosity, we deal in a different mode with our railroad corporations. The ordinary citizen is paid a flat rate of 4 per cent on his money. The corporation upon its stock, which might have earned more in the past, but admittedly could only earn less in the future, is paid, substantially, the highest possible rate it might have earned, based upon its greatest prosperity in the past, although that rate could not have been earned in the future.

The proclamation of the President taking over the railroads, and stating the sums to be paid, was promulgated on the 27th day of December, 1917. Here are the stock exchange quotations of some of the railroads affected by the order for December 26, the day before the order was made, and December 27, when it was known that the Government was to take the properties:

	Dec. 26.	Dec. 27.
Atlantic Coast	83½	92
Atchison	78	87
Baltimore & Ohio	39⅜	55
Chesapeake & Ohio	42¾	47
Great Northern	80	85
New York Central	63½	71
Northern Pacific	76	85
Pennsylvania	42½	45½
Reading	67⅜	70½
Southern Pacific	77½	84
St. Paul	36⅜	48
St. Paul (pfd.)	63½	81
Delaware & Hudson	92	100
Union Pacific	103½	112

There is the story, Senators.

The increase in these various stocks has been substantially maintained since December 27, and, undoubtedly, with the passage of this bill, there will be another upward tendency.

But our 4 per cent liberty bonds on December 26 were quoted at substantially 97, and on February 14 the second fours were quoted at 94.80. Our 4 per cent liberty bonds, held by our people, have been very gradually, but none the less certainly, declining. The railroad stocks, upon the announcement of the intention of the Government to take the railroads and pay the sums described in this bill, soared above what they had been for many, many months. We pay an exorbitant rate to the railroads, and greatly increase the value of their stocks; we pay to patriotism on liberty bonds 4 per cent, and the value of the principal we take steadily lessens.

A favorite pastime with legislators now is to find justification for any legislative act in England's example. Of course, when England's example demonstrates a firmness in dealing with vast interests and great profits quite at variance with our mode, England offers neither parallel nor precedent. When we sought to tax heavily war profits, we showed conclusively that England was taking 80 per cent of war profits. Those who desired in our taxation scheme a measure of immunity for these profits saw nothing either compelling or persuasive in England's example. In this debate I have heard stated repeatedly—and it is the fact—that England's mode of computation is similar to that suggested here, but the analogy then ceases. In actual compensation England pays upon railroad stocks between 3 and 4 per cent—a vastly different payment from that we are asked to make. I recognize the difference in the English systems and ours and how much is included within Britain's measure; but, granting all that may be said in that behalf, actually England pays upon the outstanding stock of its transportation systems between 3 and 4 per cent. I would not have had the temerity to have cited the British law unless the proponents of the bill had first adverted to it. The actual computation under the English law deprives our friends on the other side of whatever consolation obtains from having an English precedent.

It has been insisted repeatedly that the rate prescribed in the bill is merely permissive and a maximum which may by agreement be fixed. Literally this is so, but in the light of the facts the argument is wholly specious. The rate prescribed by the bill was stated by the President in his first proclamation taking over the railroads. It was stated again in his message to Congress upon the subject. It was stated in the investigation of the committee by the Director General as the scheme of settlement which would be adopted, and it was inserted in the bill pursuant to these recommendations and statements. We need, therefore, in order to determine whether this specific rate will be paid, take the President's proclamation, his message and recommendation to Congress, and the Director General's plain enunciation of his intention.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRANCE in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Might I suggest, also, to the Senator from California that the proponents of the bill on the floor of the Senate have argued that such a rate of compensation was just and fair?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes; but in the same breath, it will be recalled these gentlemen, while saying that that rate was just and fair, have also said to us, "Ah, but it is only a maximum, and it may never be fixed although it is just and fair."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. So you may take your choice of the arguments and give to them just exactly the credence which they merit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that when the proponents of this bill so argue, they themselves are answering their own argument, that it is only a maximum rate, and that they know and they expect this rate to be put in active operation.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator who has just interrogated me seems to labor under the delusion that in dealing with great interests and railroad properties, there must be some sort of logic, but I think, Mr. President, the history of railroads for all past time will demonstrate that logic is a secondary consideration.

I would not wish to be unjust to the railroads of the Nation, and I have listened with varying emotions to the eloquent appeals that have been made in their behalf upon this floor, but, in our scrupulous care to see that justice is done to the railroads of the Nation, let us do justice to the people as well.

Strangely enough, some of the advocates of the present measure have quite earnestly disagreed with the President's policy in taking over the railroads, and have endeavored to demonstrate that the railroads have been more sinned against than sinning, and that, but for governmental interference, they would have efficiently performed their functions. It is interesting to observe that these gentlemen, while disagreeing with the President, while asserting the railroads had done their full duty, and that they could have continued, if unhindered and unhampered, to perform such service as the Government demanded, are enthusiastically in favor of the present bill. I am in hearty accord with the action taken by President Wilson. I believe his seizure of the railroads was timely and wise, and not only timely and wise but absolutely necessary for the safety of the Nation. I do not, for one moment, believe that the railroads were prevented from performing their full duty to the Government by the priority orders issued by different departments. I recognize that, owing to an utter lack of system, orders were issued by one, then another, and then another of the departments of the Government, and that these orders were difficult of enforcement and interfered in some degree with celerity of transportation. Such a system as has been developed in respect to these priority orders is intolerable. The difficulty, of course, has been due to the lack of correlation and coordination, of which so much has recently been heard upon this floor. But however annoying these orders may have been to the railroad companies, and however they may have sporadically interfered, they could not have been the real cause of the breakdown of the transportation service of the Nation. The Senator from Arkansas has ably demonstrated this fact. For many years past students of railway transportation have realized the necessity for some sort of centralization and nationalization. Instances have come to the notice of us all—instances ever recurring and ever increasing—which have proven that efficient national transportation demanded railroad nationalization. Prior to our declaration of war this had become more and more obvious. The stress of war simply furnished the actual demonstration.

After some months of useless and impotent endeavor the railroad men, as well as all others, realized that, under the system existing in our country, with the difficulties and restrictions surrounding the railroads, neither service nor efficiency could be accorded in this crisis. Now, the lesson is what? It is, first, the great trunk lines of the country must be nationalized; and, secondly, there must be one directing central power of this nationalization system. It is plain that this nationalization can not be accomplished by competitive roads. There must be, to attain the desired result, an absolute unity of purpose, and with private ownership of lines of different equipment, different power, varying efficiency, such coordination and nationalization are utterly impossible. The conclusion, therefore, is irresistible that we must ultimately do in time of peace what we have been driven to do by stress in time of war, and the logical outcome of the present situation is, of course, permanent control—Government ownership.

Immediately after war was declared a Railroads War Board, embracing within its membership the best-known railroad men in the Nation, was formed. On April 11, 1917, they adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the railroads of the United States, acting through their chief executive officers here and now assembled, and stirred by a high sense of their opportunity to be of the greatest service to their country in the present national crisis, do hereby pledge themselves, with the Government of the United States, with the governments of the several States, and with one another, that during the present war they will coordinate their operations in a continental railway system, merging during such period all their merely individual and competitive activities in the effort to produce a maximum of national transportation efficiency. To this end they hereby agree to create an organization which shall have general authority to formulate in detail and from time to time a policy of operation of all or any of the railways, which policy, when and as announced by such temporary organization, shall be accepted and earnestly made effective by the several managements of the individual railroad companies here represented.

In December, 1917, before the Railroad Commission of the State of California, at regular hearings, this resolution was the subject of examination and discussion. The representatives of the Southern Pacific, the Los Angeles & Salt Lake, the Santa Fe, and the Pacific Electric Railway were witnesses. It is impossible for me to detail the evidence of these railroad representatives. Suffice it to say, however, in the language of an official epitome of the proceeding:

Leaving aside the question whether transportation conditions here are normal or abnormal (and it is abundantly clear that they are far from normal), the view that the country and the transportation system of the country must be considered as a whole for the purposes of the war, and that the conditions in the East and the West must be equalized as far as possible; that there is no sound reason why in justice the East should forego not only nonessential but essential transportation needs, while the West goes on as if nothing had happened—this view, according to the transcript, finds no favor whatever in railroad circles.

It is merely in passing that I refer to these proceedings—so brief a period before the President's order of December 27.

The testimony upon the subject is illuminating and illustrates the utter impossibility of a nationalization of railroads in anything like a unified system under private competitive management.

The present bill, while allowing excessive compensation to the railroads, fixes a time limit in which the property shall be held of 18 months. It may be remarked that, with the close of the war, 18 months will remain without a definite policy on the part of the United States, while these railroads will be under the absolute control of the Director General. It seems scarcely possible that for this interval of 18 months we should with scrupulous care provide for paying the maximum amount to the railroad companies and be utterly silent as to railroad management and governmental policy.

I object to the 18 months' period as substantially establishing at this time a policy of the return of the roads and as substantially precluding the policy of Government ownership after the war. While it may be asserted that by repeal, additional enactment, and the like, we may enter upon new policies after the war, nevertheless this bill does, in effect, tie our hands, establishing not alone our present intention, but our future policy, and this is neither wise nor statesmanlike. Were I not an advocate of Government ownership, I should protest against this provision of the bill. My advocacy of the specific policy but intensifies that protest.

The views which I entertain and express to-day upon Government ownership are not the product of a day nor the result of recent events. Years and years of dealing with the problem of railroad transportation in its various phases finally convinced me that the only way in which the intertwining difficulties of the railroad situation could be solved was by the Government itself. The American people for many, many years have been dealing with the intricate and important question of railroad transportation and railroad management with rather indifferent success, and, just as great crises have ever decided the most momentous world problems, so our war, with our railroads, has finally pointed the way. The original idea entertained by those who were managers or builders of railroads was expressed by a celebrated railroad financier of the East in "The public be damned," and by quite a famous traffic manager of the West, that "We charge all the traffic will bear."

The railroad was regarded as the private property of him who invested in it, without duty or obligation to others than the owner. The public's relation was considered as wholly secondary and of principal importance in ministering to the prosperity and the emoluments of the road. Gradually it dawned upon our people that the railroad after all constituted a public highway; that it ran through city and town and country by virtue of the permission of the people themselves; that it became so intertwined with every human activity and every business and industry that it was a public necessity; and then a few began to see the light and to insist that a public highway maintained by the sufferance of the public and traversing the public domain by virtue of the public's permission was, in its essence, first a public use. The cynical viewpoint of the early founders of the great railway systems was quickly eliminated by a rapidly awakening people, and the early suggestions that the first duty of a public carrier was to the public resulted in numerous legislative enactments and in the crystallization of a public sentiment which required the railroad to be the servant rather than the master of the public. The old idea that the railroad was designed solely for the purpose of paying dividends to its owners gave way to the new—that the paramount obligation of the road was to the public, and that the owners were entitled from the operation of the railroad only to a reasonable return upon their investment.

The problem has been, first, an economic problem, a problem of economic liberty, and out of this has grown all the other perplexing questions. By a system of regulation which has grown up of late years some of these problems have been solved, but by no means all. Regulation, sometimes drastic, sometimes lax, has been undertaken by the various States. Regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission has been undertaken on behalf of the Nation. I have heard it stated again and again upon this floor that railroad regulation has been a failure. I do not by any means concede that fact. In the jurisdiction from which I come it has been a marked success, winning alike the praise of the people and the roads themselves; but the consensus of opinion, apparently, here is that from the larger sense we have failed in our railroad regulation—failed either in recognizing the fundamental economic question from the standpoint of the public or the fundamental financial question from the standpoint of the railroad. If it be true that railroad regulation has failed in the United States, then, of course, there is but one alternative, and that is Government ownership. If it be true, as has been insisted upon this floor in the last week again and again, that regulation has been unjust to railroads and has not accomplished its real design, then these gentlemen thus asserting should welcome with me the advent of permanent Government control and ownership.

The words "Government ownership," apparently, have a singularly chilling effect. A perfect paralysis of fear is engendered by the very suggestion; and this seems so, even though the logic of events points but one way and the action of the Government in taking possession of the roads can mean but one thing.

Ever since we have had the railroad problem I have heard our learned conservative brethren tell of private initiative, individual ability, and the necessity for each in the management of railroads, and how this private ability and individual initiative alone could efficiently manage the railroads of the Nation. I have heard whispered with horror the enormity of Government management, of the calamity and the catastrophe that would befall us if the Government ever sought in any fashion to manage these great transportation systems. I have been told of the marvelous and the wondrous ability of men who drew large salaries as presidents of the various roads, of how they, with an omniscience passing human understanding, with all the dignity and the power and the ability of the greatest of potentates, successfully presided over the destinies of the railroads and, out of the million tentacles of a transportation system, wrought efficiency that staggered the imagination.

I heard the other day upon this floor in eloquent words depicted how within the grasp of the humblest was the vast power, prestige, wealth, and glory of a railroad president. I heard with bated breath and throbbing heart the evils of Government management, and how in Government management efficiency would be lost, ambition would be chilled, and the very essence of democratic social economy would be destroyed. And as I listened to the word pictures which thus entranced me I closed my eyes and wondered in what year and in what month were we hearing of private railroad management, and of its necessity for our well-being and our success and our prosperity. And then I recalled, as I recovered from the hypnotic influence of the orator, that we were in war; that the Nation faced the greatest crisis in its history; that it called upon its men and its industries for the best and the most efficient that was in them. I remembered that the Nation thought of the marvelous efficiency of private management of its railroads, and turned with pride and with confidence to its railroad managers and magnates, and left with them the great transportation problems that confronted us. And then I remembered, when wholly free from the spell of the eloquence in this Chamber, the muddling few months of last year, when private management demonstrated its inability to cope with the Nation's crisis, and the boasted efficiency of private management was found to be a mere iridescent dream.

Volumes have been written in the past of the superiority of private management. The railroad propagandist has plastered the whole Nation with demonstrations of the superiority of private efficiency. The question, though, has been decided. It is no longer academic. The pitiless logic of events has determined it. Private management and the boasted efficiency of private management could not do the job. They acknowledged defeat, and Government management succeeded. Two months ago I would have been prepared to meet, and to meet fully, every argument presented in favor of the efficiency of private management as contrasted with the efficiency of governmental management. But the question now is no longer debatable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if, in justice to the railroads, the Senator ought not to say that the railroads have been greatly handicapped by statutes that we have enacted from time to time, and which, when the roads were taken over by the Government, the Director General, with a stroke of the pen or in some other way, practically wiped off the statute books, thus giving himself a free hand to do what the railroads could not do because of our legislation?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the suggestion. I will write with just as much gentleness and with just as tender a hand the obituary of private management in the United States; and I am perfectly willing to concede in this obituary that the railroad companies have had many, many difficulties—those suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire and others as well—to surmount, and that with all these difficulties they have not been able to do the job, and the Government of the United States is doing the job to-day; and praise God, Senators, it is the United States Government that is going to do the job for all time now.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, the Senator will admit that the Government is doing the job because the Government has removed the obstacles to which I called the Senator's attention.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to admit anything that will add to the occasion or that will in any way soften anything that may be said concerning the railroad situation, and that the Government can do things, like the removal of obstacles and the like, suggested by the Senator, which the railroads could not do. Very freely and very gladly do I concede it.

The objection most frequently voiced on both sides of the Chamber to Government ownership is that politics would play an important and injurious part in the management of the roads. When I advocate Government ownership and management under the present administration, even though I oppose this bill, my friends across the aisle, I presume, will acquit me of partisanship. Indeed, my insistence upon this policy evinces a confidence in the present administration which, I am shocked to say, I do not find readily and enthusiastically seconded by my Democratic brethren. I have little or no fear of the politics which might be done in a Government-owned road.

In the State which I have the honor to represent we have had our experience in the kind of politics done under private management and by the efficiency of private management of railroads. We have seen there only the replica of what has occurred in many States, a great transportation company, as a short cut to governmental favors, taking possession of the Government itself. We saw there for a period of nearly 40 years every political office in the gift of that railroad company. We saw legislatures and courts corrupted and a power within the State which used the State as a mere appurtenance to a railroad system. We saw the kind of politics which led men to the polls like sheep to the shambles, which made the very bread and butter of women and children depend upon the ticket a railroad employee should vote. We saw the most beautiful State in all this Union honeycombed with corruption and a people second to none on earth cowering under a political and commercial terrorism.

Mr. President, I will risk any kind of politics under Government ownership rather than the politics I have seen under private ownership.

I was astonished the other day, when listening to the debate upon this floor, to hear it stated that employment in the railroad service under the Government of the United States would destroy the initiative of men, would chill the ambition of individuals, and would prevent the real service that is designed to be given by men who enter into that particular avocation. I deny that this is so. Why, Senators, why are you here and why am I? Why do we sit here in the rigors of winter and in all the horrors of the hottest part of a Washington summer? Are we sitting here with ambition chilled because we are Government employees, or are we sitting here for the reasons that will actuate men when they enter the employment of the Government in the railroad service—sitting here because, after all, back in the mind of every American citizen is the hope that he may say, when the time comes after his limited period in this sphere: "I have done something of good; I have not lived in vain"? And these men who go into the Government service, working for the railroads of the Nation, will have the same ambition, the same desires, the same initiative, that you see evinced every day in the service of the Government.

Chill the ambition of men because they work for the State? What a singular and remarkable doctrine to be announced upon the floor of the United States Senate! Why do my friend here and my friend here leave incomes of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, sacrifice practically everything financially, that they may come here for $7,500? They come here for the very reason that you will find the best and the bravest and the ablest in all the engineering world, the best and the ablest and the bravest there are in every walk of life, go into the Government service, to perform something not alone for the individual, but to do the higher thing—the thing, thank God, that all of us are here to do—to do something as well for our people and for our country.

Chill ambition, Mr. President? Destroy initiative? Not so; not so at all. Politics in a nationally run railroad? Why, the first manager of a nationally run railroad that dared discharge a single man for politics would be swept from official life by an overwhelming flood of public opinion that would brook no opposition. Politics in a nationally run railroad wherein the employees were directed under civil service, as of necessity these would be? Politics? Politics?

Ah, I fear that they do not distinguish between different kinds of politics, these who inveigh against the politics that may exist under public management and the awful politics that we have seen under private "efficiency" and private management.

I come from a city of more than half a million inhabitants. Side by side with the privately owned street railway is that of which we are most proud, our municipally owned railway. I was delighted to go from the capital of the State to do what little I could in the great struggle that we had for municipal ownership in that city. We then had every argument advanced against municipal ownership that has been announced in this Chamber in the last week against Government ownership of the transportation systems of the country; every single argument, running the gamut from the horror of the loss of private initiative and from the terror of politics in the management of the roads to the expense and the trouble and the difficulty and the inefficiency of public management. We won, finally, in our fight before the people. To-day, side by side with the privately owned road is the municipally owned road of the city of San Francisco. Where is the efficiency? Ah, the efficiency is conceded to be with the municipally owned road; and, as they run side by side, the municipal road is run better, is run more cleanly, is operated infinitely better in every respect, is admittedly the superior of the privately owned road, and it pays its men higher wages, it gives them less hours of labor, it makes a greater profit, than the privately owned road.

I recognize, of course, Mr. President, that the comparison is but slight between a municipally owned street railway system and the great transportation system of the Nation. Nevertheless, the analogy is there. Politics in that municipal road? Why, in the city of San Francisco, of varied politics and of experiences, indeed, the most bizarre of any city in America, during the time we maintained a municipally owned road a man has not dared to go to that road and try to inject it into the politics of the city, or try to make of its employees mere political puppets. Say this, if you can, of the privately owned road.

My State is not alone in these experiences. I gathered together to present to you to-day the story of various railroads in this Nation. I found that the material at hand was so great that within the limits of no ordinary effort could I hope to present even an outline of the facts. I would like to read you the fascinating story of Charles Francis Adams of the Erie road. I would like to put into the RECORD the original agreements which he for the first time presented to a startled Nation. I would like to tell you the story of the New Haven road, of its wild finance, of railroad wreckers and of railroad reorganizers. If time permitted I would like to dwell with you upon the Union Pacific and the Southern Pacific and the New York Central, and I would like to point the moral from the story of all these privately owned railroads—the moral that every man to-day ought fully to understand. The tale of private management is a sordid and a wretched and a wicked and a cruel tale. It is the story of greed and avarice, of plunder and wrong and corruption.

Gentlemen upon this floor have said all this is of the past. Perhaps it is, perhaps it is not. You had your experience. You know what it means. The results you understand. In the kaleidoscopic events that are now transpiring, none can foresee into the dim and uncertain future. With the experience before you, with your knowledge of what private management has meant in the past, with your clear perception of its possibilities for wrong and for evil, with the demonstration to-day of its inability to do the big job, with the doubtful success of regulation alike proclaimed by railroads and regulators, why hesitate in the inevitable course, the course which, despite you and me, will, nevertheless, be the course pursued.

I would not have you believe that all private management is of the sort which I have here condemned and to which I have here adverted. There are many railroads privately managed fairly, honorably, and justly. I am not condemning, by what I have said, individuals at all. I would protect investors in legitimate railroad securities to the uttermost limit; and nothing better demonstrates how governmental action does protect the value of railroad securities than the sudden and remarkable jump in all the railroad stocks on the 27th of December last, when the President proclaimed the seizure of the roads. I have been condemning the system, the system which has made possible the wreckage and wrongs, the corruption and infamy, and the system has been painted so often, its true story so frequently portrayed, that I have hesitated by specific instances to demonstrate what is now common knowledge of all Americans.

We have paid the price of private ownership. We have paid the price of private ownership in millions of acres of our best farm lands. We have paid the price in our forests, in our coal deposits, our lands gushing with oil. We have paid the price in building up overnight fabulous fortunes, used for the undoing of the State. We have paid the price in handicapping our own people, in distorting our public and our private economy, in corrupting our political life, and in tainting the very fountain head of justice. We have paid the price of private ownership in this Nation, and no matter what may be the attitude of any of us to-day, despite barriers or obstacles, the Nation is marching straight to the goal of public ownership, and the people at last will come into their own.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I beg leave to submit an amendment to the pending bill. I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to offer the following amendment to the pending bill. I ask that it may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to notify the Senate that if conditions permit I shall to-morrow discuss the pending bill. I shall support the bill as reported by the committee. I am not prepared to go on this afternoon. I have been unavoidably absent from the Senate for nearly a week.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was very much pleased when the President took over the railroads of the country. There can be no doubt but that our system of transportation had broken down, and he was entirely justified in taking possession. The pending bill is not of legislative origin. It comes to us from the President, and provides for the method of payment by the Government to the railroad companies for the use of the railroads while the Government holds possession. Every honest person must concede that the railroads are entitled to fair and just compensation for the use of their properties. To give them less would be not only unconstitutional but unjust, both in equity and in morals. To give them more than just and honest compensation is unfair and unjust to the people who must pay the taxes. Every man, woman, and child in the country has a direct interest in the question of transportation. There is nothing that we eat, wear, or use in any way but part of its cost is transportation.

It enters into the expense of our daily life. There is no way to escape it. Every person who wears clothes, eats food, or burns fuel contributes to the great transportation systems of our country. Transportation is, therefore, a tax. Disguise it as you may, cover it up as you will, the fact remains nevertheless that all freight charges are as much a tax upon all of the people as though they were levied directly by legislative authority. Its importance, therefore, can not be overestimated. To increase the taxes, either directly or through this indirect method of paying the railroads, except to such an extent as may be absolutely necessary, is not only unwise and unjust, but it is fraught with the gravest dangers and will interfere seriously with the great work that is now before us of prosecuting the war.

The present bill authorizes the President to make agreements with the railway companies by which the Government shall pay for the use of railroad properties during the period of Government possession and operation the average net operating income of such roads for the three-year period ending June 30, 1917. I regret exceedingly that the President has selected and the committee in reporting the bill has approved years that will result in paying to the railroad companies an income very much in excess of that to which they are fairly and justly entitled as public carriers.

Mr. President, there are no three consecutive years in our history outside of those selected that would bring as large a return to the railroads as the three years ending June 30 last. This plan will result in giving to the railroad companies a much larger income than is fair and just and an income much greater than they have been receiving in normal times. Years have been selected during which the railroad traffic was greater than any other years in the history of the country. The selection of these years by the President and the approval of such selection by the committee reporting the bill will result in the placing of an obligation upon an already overburdened people that can not be justified as a fair and equitable distribution of the burdens of taxation.

As illustrating how the proposed plan will actually work out in practice, let us take a few of the well-known railway systems of the country and see what the result will be as to them: In the East we will take the New York Central and the Pennsylvania Railroad. Under this proposed system the payment the Government will be required to make to the stockholders of the New York Central Railroad is an annual dividend of 12.96 per cent.

The Pennsylvania system is composed of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania Co.; one operates the lines east of Pittsburgh and the other the lines west of Pittsburgh. Under the pending bill the Government would be required to pay the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. a dividend of 8.93 per cent and the Pennsylvania Co. a dividend of 11.92 per cent. In the southern part of the country the Government would pay to the Illinois Central Railway Co. a dividend of 11.33 per cent; to the Louisville & Nashville Railway Co. a dividend of 16.75 per cent; to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co. a dividend of 9.31 per cent; and in the mid-western section of the country the stockholders of the Union Pacific Railway Co. would receive a dividend of 9.64 per cent; of the North Western Railway Co. a dividend of 10.18 per cent; and of the Burlington Railway Co. a dividend of 22.05 per cent.

These great systems are illustrations of how the plan would work out. Other railroad companies would receive less, and many of them would receive a much larger dividend. In order to determine the exact amount that under the pending bill, under such an agreement, would be paid to practically any railroad in the United States I desire to insert at this point a table prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, Interstate Commerce Commission, naming the railway companies whose average net income to capital stock has been more than 5 per cent during the three years ending June 30, 1917, and showing what each one of them would receive under the proposed guaranty. It is a table, as I said, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is included in the minority report submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I ask permission to insert it at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Road.	Capital stock actually outstanding (average for the 3 years ended June 30, 1917).	Average net income for the 3 years ended June 30, 1917.	Average per cent of net income to capital stock.

Mr. NORRIS. It will be observed that this table includes practically every railroad in the United States. It might be well to remember also in passing that, taking the country as a whole, a little more than one-half of the stock of the railroads in the country was originally issued without any consideration and represents nothing but water. It must be remembered, also, that the income shown in this table is the net income, and represents just what would be paid to the stockholders after all the expenses including taxes, and so forth, have been paid. It does not, however, include income derived from other sources than operation. In some instances this income represents a large amount of money. Income derived from the sale of lands, income from leases, and so forth, would be in addition to the amount named in the table. The pending bill also contains a provision giving the President authority to make agreements in regard to the payment by the Government to railroads that did not make or declare dividends during the three-year period selected. He is authorized to make agreements with such roads, paying them whatever in his judgment is just.

We must remember also that the bill provides that the Government while it has possession of the roads shall keep them in repair and return them to the owners in as good a condition as they are now. There is also a provision that any road not satisfied with the allowance made by the President shall have the right to go into court in order to collect whatever it may be able to prove a just and fair allowance. I mention this provision not in criticism, but to show that those roads which did not pay dividends during the period selected will be paid a fair and just income, and therefore the aggregate paid to all the railroads of the country is liable to be in excess of the amounts that will be derived from the percentages contained in the table.

We are now engaged in the most gigantic undertaking that has ever been presented to our people. Our Government is demanding of its citizens sacrifices of all kinds and almost without limit. Every patriotic citizen is backing up the Government in carrying on this great war. All of our people are united in a determination that the war must be won at any cost. Whatever sacrifice it is necessary to make must be made and is being made willingly and without hesitation. From all over the country, from the workshop, from the farm, from the counting house, from the professional office there comes a patriotic willingness to sacrifice in every possible way in order that victory may come to our arms.

Our people are buying fewer clothes, eating less food, giving up luxuries, and many of the necessaries of life, in order to help sustain our brave boys in the trenches. No patriotic citizen is willing to permit anything to stand in the way of our success, and the success which we all demand is that militarism shall receive its death knell, that conquest and subjugation of peoples shall be a thing of the past, and we will not lay down our arms until a peace lasting and permanent shall have been attained.

This is a gigantic task and it requires the cooperation and assistance of every patriotic citizen everywhere under the flag. Our people have responded with a willingness and a determination to win the war at any cost, unsurpassed in the history of the world. We are a united people behind our Army. We must remain united. Nothing must be done by those in control of the Government that will have any tendency to create dissatisfaction or any feeling that any class of people is enabled to make money out of the sacrifices of their fellow men. No man, no set of men, no partnership, no corporation has a moral right to make an unreasonable or unconscionable profit out of any industry connected with the war, if by so doing the burdens of the great bulk of our people are increased. Our Government has asked its people to subscribe billions of dollars in bonds drawing 4 per cent interest. We are going to ask them to subscribe additional sums, to make additional sacrifices. The Government ought to be able to go before the people when it asks for such sacrifices with clean hands. It should be able to say that no act of legislation or of administration has willingly or consciously been the means of permitting profiteering at the expense of honest citizenship.

We have asked the children to donate their pennies and their childish savings to the Government in the way of buying thrift stamps. What will be the result when we make the next drive for bond subscriptions, when we go into a town along the Pennsylvania Co. lines, and ask the laborer to further economize in order that he may have money to loan to the Government at 4 per cent? Will we tell him, when we ask for his subscription, that the railroad company running by his door has been guaranteed by the same Government asking a subscription from him a net income of practically 12 per cent on all stock of that company?

Will we go out upon the fertile plains of Nebraska and meet the farmer who is returning after dark from 12 to 14 hours' labor, producing food for our Army and the armies of our allies, and ask him to subscribe for more liberty bonds, without explaining to him that the money we borrow from him at 4 per cent interest is going to be used in part to pay the Burlington Railroad that passes his farm an income of over 22 per cent? Will we explain to the children living along the Louisville & Nashville Railroad in the South that the pennies which we borrow from them in the sale of thrift stamps are to be turned over to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. in order that the stockholders of that corporation may receive a net income of nearly 17 per cent?

Is our action in giving legislative approval to the President's wish going to have a tendency to satisfy the great bulk of the American people and keep them united and willing to sacrifice still more, or will it have a tendency to create dissatisfaction and even complaint among the millions of citizens who feel that sacrifice should not be confined to one class of people only, but that it should be extended to every association and corporation throughout the length and breadth of the land? To my mind, we are taking a step that is liable to be construed by honest-minded people as a legal protection to profiteering on the part of the transportation companies of the country. Such a step will not unite our people. It will not have a tendency to increase the patriotic spirit that is so necessary and essential in winning this war, and while I do not believe that such a step will prohibit our patriotic citizenship from doing their best and doing their all, yet it will leave in their minds a sense of injustice that when this awful conflict is over will bear its fruit, and may have a tendency to swing the pendulum too far the other way and demand the exaction that will bring down upon the heads of honest men and honest business destruction and devastation.

Another objectionable provision of the bill is that it gives to the President the power to make and change freight rates at his discretion. There is no reason why the law on this subject should be changed. Under existing law the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to regulate the rates, and when a carrier desires to increase a rate it must first file the proposed increase with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission determines after a hearing, either on its own motion or on the application of shippers, whether such increase is justified and should be allowed. In the meantime the new proposed rate does not go into effect. Under the pending bill the President can change or increase a rate at any time, and the change so made goes into effect at once and remains in effect until changed by legal authority. It provides, in substance, that after the President has made a rate anyone feeling aggrieved can appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if after a hearing the Interstate Commerce Commission thinks the rate made by the President is unjust it can modify the rate or change it back to the original rate. Everyone familiar with appeals in courts and tribunals knows what this means. With the large amount of business before the Interstate Commerce Commission it would mean that, so far as this part of the bill is concerned, there would be no practical relief. The delays, the time, and the expense necessary to carry on such an appeal, particularly when the Government, represented by the President, is on the other side, is an undertaking that any citizen or group of citizens might well shrink from going into. This feature is not the only objection to this provision. Without imputing to the Interstate Commerce Commission any intention of doing anything that is not fair or just, it is asking a great deal of them, whatever the evidence may disclose, to overrule the President of the United States, the man who gave them their positions and who has power to retire them to private life if their terms expire while he remains in office. It is like commencing an action in the appellate court and having the judgment of that court reviewed by the inferior court. It is like appealing from the judgment of the judge to the judgment of his clerk, whom the judge appointed to the position.

It is unnecessary, as I have said, to confer this rate-making power upon the President. It is unwise to do it, even though he asks it. He is already overburdened with authority, and it is a recognized fact that he will not be able to give his personal attention to the details of rate making. He could not do it if he wanted to. He will not be able to do it even if he desires to. Moreover, it is not a power necessary to vest in the President in order to carry on the war or to coordinate the different functions of governmental agencies. When he acts on this authority he will necessarily have to act through other people. The place where he would naturally go for his information would be to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if it is the intention that the President shall get his information from the Interstate Commerce Commission, then why take such a round-about course? Why not permit the Interstate Commerce Commission, the best posted tribunal on railroad rates, to have original jurisdiction and to do as they now have authority to do in the rate-making function. If the theory is that the President will get his information from the Interstate Commerce Commission, then why go through the formality of providing for an appeal from the President to the commission. The freight rate making power is an extremely important function of the Government. It practically affects the cost of living of all our people. And this is true, whether they are actually engaged in shipping freight or not. It is true of the man who never sees a railroad. It is true of the little child too young to participate in governmental affairs. It has a vital influence upon our part in the great war struggle. It may spell the difference between success and failure. It affects the comfort and the happiness of all, and enters minutely into the very existence of our people. This is a power we should not give to the President, and I regret more than I can say that he has asked us to do so.

I will not go into a further discussion of the bill, although I think there are other features that are objectionable and others that are commendable. I have only pointed out the two objection which, in my judgment, are the most important. I realize the importance of the legislation, but there is no question in it that must necessarily be decided in a day. Even if the bill were defeated, it would not interfere with the management of the railroads. The Government has possession of the roads, and if the method of compensation and the rate-making power were not passed on at once, it would not interfere with the Government's control and management. The railroads ought to be paid a fair and just compensation for their use. We could not take away this right, even though we wanted to, and so far as I am aware, no person, either in the Senate or out of it, has any desire to do anything but justice and equity to our railroads, as we want to do equity and justice to all our people. More than this they have no right to ask, and more than this we should refuse to give. It is important that we protect them in all their rights, but it is equally important that we protect the already overburdened taxpayers of our country from unjust and unfair taxation.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, in support of the amendment which I have introduced, which is similar to one offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], to restore the original language of section 13 of the bill, which does not fix a time limit when the railroads must be turned back to private ownership, I desire to present, and to have printed as a part of my remarks, a petition from the national legislative representatives of the railroad brotherhoods, representing about 2,000,000 employees of the railroads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The petition referred to is as follows:

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Being fully cognizant of the seriousness of the crisis confronting our country, and realizing the dangers besetting our liberties, it is the honest, earnest desire of the railroad employees to give our full, loyal, and united support to our Government, and to make certain, clear, and decisive the conclusion of our aims. Therefore we desire to make effective all the agencies of the Government, and we fully appreciate that the question of transportation is one of the important factors at this time.

While we are pledged to, and hereby reaffirm our pledge of, loyalty and whole-hearted support to our country, our Government, and our President during this war, we are aware of the seriousness of the situation that inevitably must follow immediately after the close of hostilities in the readjustment of conditions in the United States; and whereas the Government of the United States has, by proclamation of the President, assumed control of the transportation systems for the period of the war, with which we are in accord, we believe that full time should be given after the close of hostilities to enable just, fair, and impartial determination of the proper methods of adjustment of the rights and equities of the public, the owners of the transportation lines so taken, and of the employees thereof, and as representatives of nearly 2,000,000 employees of the railroads of the United States, we most earnestly and respectfully petition the Congress of the United States not to fix a time limit at which the railroads must be turned back to private ownership, leaving this question for future determination, and thereby giving ample time for the adjustment of matters growing out of the temporary control of same with equal justice to all parties at interest.

Very respectfully,

H. E. Wills, A. G. C. E. and national legislative representative Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; P. J. McNamara, vice president, national legislative representative, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen; W. M. Clark, vice president, national legislative representative, Order of Railway Conductors; W. N. Doak, vice president, national legislative representative, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; A. O. Wharton, president railway-employees department, American Federation of Labor; Martin F. Ryan, grand president Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America; J. A. Franklin, president International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders and Helpers of America; F. J. McNulty, president International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; James J. Hynes, president Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers International Association; J. W. Kline, president International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers; William H. Johnston, president International Association of Machinists.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I wish to say that I heartily agree with the action of the President in taking over the railroads during the war, and I am consequently in favor of the pending bill to enable the President to carry out his patriotic purpose to operate them in the best interests of the Government.

I have observed for a number of years the gradual growth of sentiment in this country for Government ownership not only of railroads but of all public utilities, and, so far as I am personally concerned, it can not come too soon to suit me. This has been occasioned largely by reason of the fact that the management of the railroads has failed to recognize the rights of the people and the interests of the public in the control and operation of the roads. But whether the American people are quite yet prepared for this great change, to pay the price, and to assume the necessary obligations which would result therefrom, is a debatable question which can not be settled in emergency legislation in time of war. Now, however, that the Government has control of the railroads, I am in favor of giving Government control and operation a thorough and complete trial, not only in time of war but in time of peace. I think, therefore, that there should be no time limit as to when the railroads should be returned to their owners, but that we should meet that question when we get to it in the general readjustment of things after the war. The great task before the American people to-day is that of winning the war. It does seem to me that if Government ownership proves advantageous to the public in time of war, under the extreme difficulties of operation, it would prove of even greater benefit to the people in time of peace, when more attention could be given to the individual citizen and less attention given to the requirements of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I stated yesterday, I have no particular desire to speak on this measure for the purposes of the RECORD. I have, however, for many years been especially interested in the so-called railroad problem, and being a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, which has this matter directly in charge, and having some ideas on the subject, I have concluded to submit them to the Senate. I realize, however, that much of what I shall say will be of very little use unless Senators themselves shall follow me in the analysis or comparison which I shall make between the bill and the substitute which I have offered. I present this substitute not as being an expression of my views as to what the bill should be. My purpose has been not to change the pending bill in its intent but to make clear that intent. It becomes my duty in this regard to criticize, but not captiously, the measure under consideration in order to disclose its defects, to the end that they may be corrected. I believe that a careful study of the substitute will convince Senators that it makes clear the intent of the committee.

This legislation has its origin in the act of August, 1916, by which Congress authorized the President to take over the railroads of the country. That authority provided that they should be taken over by the war power through the Secretary of War. The President, however, vested the control of the roads in the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the President did not have the right to vest this authority in the Secretary of the Treasury instead of in the Secretary of War, if he saw fit to do so, but the act was passed on the theory that it was a war measure and therefore had relation—and, as Congress understood it, had sole relation—to the question of war. I did not understand at the time, although I am not complaining now at the different interpretation placed upon the act, that it was intended as a general provision to take over the railroads of the country for every conceivable purpose. I though that Federal control was to be exercised in order that the railroads of the country might more efficiently handle the war material, the troops, and other things connected with the war. I doubt if anyone would have thought favorably at the time the act was passed of a proposition to make the Secretary of the Treasury Director General of the Railroads.

The Secretary of the Treasury already had a very large job, indeed he had several large jobs on his hands. It would seem that his duties as Secretary of the Treasury would be quite sufficient to occupy one man's time—even the very ablest man in the country. But he was not only the head of the Treasury Department, which will have in charge the raising of from ten to twelve billion dollars in cash between this and the 1st day of July, and which has upon its hands the greatest financial responsibilities ever known to any Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton's time, but he was also at the head of the Federal Reserve Board, he was chairman of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and he is about to be placed in charge of the finance corporation, to be created by Congress. This power in August last was vested by Congress in the President, and it was believed by all at that time, I think, that the officer named in the bill—the Secretary of War—would be the person who would exercise the war power. But the President saw fit to vest that function in the already overworked Secretary of the Treasury. I do not wish to criticize the ability or the character of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I simply wish to state the fact that two positions, the duties of each requiring almost a superman to perform, in this crisis have been placed upon Secretary McAdoo.

This is an administration measure. It originated not in the Congress; it was not drawn by a Member of Congress or by any committee of Congress; it was prepared in the Treasury Department, and presented to Congress as a war measure. There are three features of the bill which provoked a good deal of discussion before the committee, and practically only three. One is the provision relative to the compensation to be paid the railroads; another was the question of rate making during Federal control; and the third had relation to the duration of the period of Federal control. On these three subjects there was prolonged discussion before the committee; and upon two of them, I think I can state without betraying any confidence—because outsiders were present before the committee—the committee was deadlocked, namely, the period of Federal control and the question of rate making. So the provisions that appear in the bill relating to these two subjects were the result of a compromise, satisfactory, I think, to no one. I know the two conferees who prepared it were not satisfied with it, but it was the best they could do to harmonize the conflicting differences of opinion between the two factions of the committee which they represented.

Personally, I believe that the compensation provided in the bill is too great. I do not know, however, whether or not it is greater than a court would allow to the railroads under the conditions. I apprehend that if the railroads had resort to the courts to determine what compensation they should receive the courts would decide the matter under existing conditions. They would not, in my judgment, take into consideration the various theories which have been advanced here as to what is just compensation to a railroad company in time of peace. Evidently, in my judgment, the railroads would be entitled to receive what the courts would find they would have probably earned had not Federal control occurred. Yet, believing as I did and as I do believe that the compensation is too great, nevertheless I had in mind that this was emergency legislation and that the compensation provided would continue only during the war and that a basis of agreement between the railroads and the President must be provided, I consented to this provision of the bill.

An agreement was thought desirable in order that the matter might be expedited and the question promptly settled for the good of the country. It is evident that if the Congress proposed a compensation which the railroads believed was much less than they would receive at the hands of a court, they would not accept it, and the question, therefore, would be left unsettled. I consented, however, to the provision relative to compensation on the theory that the other provisions of the bill would be adjusted in a manner which would minimize the compensation feature. For instance, I did not wish this compensation to be paid to the railroads a day longer than the Government holds control of the roads. I recognize, of course, the force of the argument that it might require some little time to adjust matters incident to turning the roads back to their owners, and perhaps provision should be made for that; but when I supported the compensation provision I had no idea that the term of control would be left indefinite or extended to as long a period as 18 months.

I know it is argued here that some time should be allowed for Congress to enact legislation to correct existing conditions—that is, conditions that have been recognized as bad in times of peace—but I wish to say to those Senators who advance that argument that they voted for and put into this bill a provision that the railroads may be turned back any day by the President of the United States before July 1, 1917, and at any time thereafter by agreement with the railroads he may turn them back. No time is required to elapse before the President may release them to their owners. Senators who are making the argument that it would require much time have evidently forgotten that provision in the bill. I can see no reason, so far as war is concerned—and this is a war measure—why these roads could not be turned back to their owners inside of three months, or six months at the outside.

I do not care to discuss the question of Government ownership. It is not properly involved in the bill. It has no place here, but should be considered when it is presented upon its merits uninvolved in coercive emergency war legislation. I say now, as I said to the committee, when that question comes up on its merits, I shall be prepared to meet it; but I object to writing into a bill, known as a war measure, legislation which does not affect the war and which might not be enacted in time of peace. Yet I shall attempt to show before I am through that there are several provisions in this bill that were put in because there was an opportunity to put them in, and thus to provide, through Executive order, for legislation that Congress had failed to enact in time of peace, but which its proponents feel they can engraft onto a war-emergency bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely want to ask the Senator whether those matters were put in the bill by the committee or whether they were put in the bill by those who originally drafted it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They were all put in by those who originally drafted it I think the men who drew this bill knew what they wanted; but I do not think that the members of the committee understand all of the provisions of the bill, as I shall later attempt to show.

I have said I objected to putting legislation on a war emergency bill designed for a time of peace only. We have been doing that in this Congress to a great extent. I condemn such action, regardless of whether the legislation as applicable to a time of peace is, in my opinion, right or wrong. My objection is that such legislation does not fairly and squarely meet the issue. As an illustration, for instance, the bill as originally presented to the committee gave the President the right to fix all rates without regard to the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the railroad owners finally came around to the point where they advocated that proposition, because it was clearly known and understood that an arrangement or understanding had been had with them to the effect that their rates and fares were to be raised by the Director General, and that the compensation to their employees would also be increased. This understanding would be popular with both the owners and their employees. The fact is the railroads have not been able up to this date to obtain from the Interstate Commerce Commission what they are going to obtain under this bill. That is an open secret; nobody will deny it. But is it in consonance with popular government to allow a dictator to do what the people's agencies had refused to do?

I submit, Mr. President, that if there is one commission or board in this country that has enjoyed the respect and the confidence of the people of the United States more than any other it is the Interstate Commerce Commission. This bill, whether intended to do so or not, practically discredits that commission, and thus the people's tribunal, the tribunal that has stood between the people and the railroads, will be put out of commission practically, so far as rate-making is concerned. That, I repeat, is an attempt to enact legislation on a war emergency bill that could not be secured in time of peace.

I submit, Mr. President, that rate making is not a war function. The railroads have been taken over; they can be operated in any manner that the President may desire and order. Of course, there is a question of raising money from the shippers to help pay the expense by an increase of rates, and one Senator has stated that it is perfectly proper that in a time of emergency the shippers of this country, who, as he says, are making vast sums of money, should pay additional compensation for hauling their freight and transporting passengers. That is the same old fallacious argument. The wealthy manufacturers, who, as it is said, are making money out of munitions, and so forth, do not pay the freight; it comes out of the consumers; it always has come out of the consumers. The railroads have always clamored for additional rates because they knew that if they obtained what they asked for they could not only meet any additional expense but reap a reward besides from the surplus. This same principle is involved in our internal-revenue tax on many commodities. Take, for instance, tobacco. The tax on tobacco is 5 cents a pound. A little plug of Piper-Heidsieck before the war cost 5 cents. There are 12 of those plugs in a pound. The tax was 5 cents a pound, but even before the law went into effect tobacco dealers charged 6 cents a plug in anticipation of the tax, thus obtaining 12 cents a pound to pay a tax that amounted to 5 cents. That tax was a money-maker for the tobacco men. They pay the Government 5 cents and then recoup 12 cents from the consumer. So it is with the unjust increase of railroad rates.

You increase the rate beyond the just and reasonable amount, and not only are all the extra charges met but a large surplus is turned into the treasury of the railroads. Now, I do not wish to be understood as saying that the railroads are not entitled to just and reasonable rates; they may be entitled to an increase in rates; but I want some tribunal of the people to determine what are just and reasonable rates.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I am in entire accord with the Senator's argument. It seems to me to be unanswerable. I want to suggest to the Senator what has probably occurred to him—in fact, he may have referred to it while I was out of the Chamber—that in the event the President takes over only a portion of the railroads we will have two standards of charge for freight, and possibly for passengers. If only a portion of the railroad systems are taken over and the others are left in private management, does not the Senator think, under those circumstances, that if the rates were raised by presidential order with regard to the systems under Federal control it would be necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to raise all rates so as to protect the other roads, or, failing to do so, the other roads would practically go in the hands of receivers?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is quite right, because the probabilities are that the roads which the President does not take, if he leaves out any of them, will be the poorest roads, the roads which probably could make a case standing alone which would demand a higher rate than they are already receiving; but that is one of the confusions that exist in the bill to which I propose to call attention as I proceed. I am now discussing, as a preface to an analysis of the bill which I shall undertake shortly, some of the general principles involved in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask a question which the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado suggests to my mind. How has the committee dealt with the subject of what are popularly called short lines?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee has practically left it open to the President. The President can take over all of the roads, or any portion of them. Immediately after he appointed the Director General, Mr. McAdoo sent out notices to all the roads stating the fact that the railroads generally had been taken over, but not stating specifically that that particular road had been taken over; and Mr. McAdoo and his spokesman, Mr. Anderson, who appeared before the committee, insisted that as circumstances developed they would determine whether or not any particular road would be taken over. The short-line men came before the committee and made a pretty strong case to the effect that even if they were not taken over, and by any means the traffic which had theretofore gone over them was diverted to some other road or destroyed they would be injured, and therefore would be entitled to compensation. Perhaps, in equity, they would; but I doubt whether they would have any legal status in a court when they asked for damages on such a ground.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is likely true as a legal proposition; but when the Government takes over a line of road it practically gets behind that road as a financial proposition. The Government is practically the backer. Now, if it leaves a short line, one of the feeders of a trunk line, without the support and prop of the Government, that short line is going to suffer financially immediately and instantly, not alone on the question of rates, and so forth, but it is left without the support which is almost necessary to have in view of the fact that the other lines have it. It could deal properly with its affairs if it were permitted to deal with them before a commission; but that is no longer possible.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the road is not taken over, of course it could go to the commission; but a commission could not order a road that has been taken over by the Government to do anything.

Mr. BORAH. No; but what could the commission do toward sustaining and strengthening the credit and the standing of one of these short lines?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It could do nothing except to give them larger rates, if they saw fit to do that.

Mr. BORAH. It would be a chaotic state of affairs to have rates made by the President on the trunk lines and to have the short-line rate made by the commission.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator is absolutely right; and there is another element that he has left out that complicates the situation very much. A great many of these short-line roads have made arrangements heretofore for their rolling stock, their cars, largely with the stronger roads. Under this order every one of those cars can be taken away from the short-line roads.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in connection with the question just propounded by the Senator from Idaho, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan concerning this phase of the relation between the trunk lines and the short-line roads: As the law now is, the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to fix the division of the rate. That is, if freight either originates on a short line or is destined to a short line, the Interstate Commerce Commission has the authority to determine what part of that rate the short line shall enjoy. That is true, is it not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the bill that we have before us that power is entirely taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is to say, that is not part of the power which is reserved to the Interstate Commerce Commission under section 10; and in my opinion the short lines would very speedily find their way into bankruptcy.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no doubt that the very logic of the situation will compel the Director General to take over all of the railroads of the United States, notwithstanding it will impose a very heavy financial burden upon the Government and involve it in a loss. Of course, the Director General can increase freight and passenger rates generally and thus from producers and consumers recoup this loss.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Director General has already notified several of the shorter lines that he did not intend to take them over.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am much obliged to the Senator from Kansas, because I had forgotten that. It is true that many of the roads which considered themselves as having been taken over under the Director's order afterwards received notice that they had not been taken over. Now, I do not know just exactly how those roads are situated, whether they will be particularly embarrassed by this order or not. I can conceive of a road to which it would make no difference whether it was taken over or not. But the roads to which the Senator from Idaho refers are so related to the trunk lines, the main roads, that it would spell ruin to them if they were left out; and I imagine that the President will have to take that into consideration and include those roads in the order.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. TOWNSEND. With pleasure.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have in mind a short road which is a feeder to a trunk-line road that was built under a contract with the trunk-line road, and has a traffic arrangement with it, arranged by contract, by which rolling stock is used upon the feeder. Did anything appear before the committee regarding that class of roads, and what would be the effect upon the existing contract?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand that it is a part of the system?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; it is built independently, but is operated under contract with the trunk line, and the trunk line furnishes to it a portion of its rolling stock.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should believe that that was a part of the system if it is under contract for operation and is operating in connection with a trunk line.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to say, on that subject, that I do not think there is anything in the bill that affects any contract between a short-line road not taken over and any other road. If the roads have any valid contracts in existence running a definite length of time, of course this bill does not affect those contracts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I spoke a moment ago in condemnation of the disposition that has been so frequently manifested to legislate on a war measure in behalf of a condition that is not at all related to war, but simply because there was an opportunity and an emergency existing, pressure could be brought to bear, and that legislation secured. Illustrating that further than I have already done in connection with this bill, I call attention to the food-control bill. That department has been very active, and I am not condemning it. I do not speak in condemnation of what it has done, except to criticize the exercise of power that is not connected with the war.

For instance, an order was issued by that department grading potatoes. Now, it may be a good thing to grade potatoes. I presume it is. A proper grading of potatoes may be most desirable, but not as a war measure. It does not contribute to the production of food. It does not make potatoes more nutritious nor increase their consumption, but it does irritate the people. To-day that order grading potatoes has done more to disturb potato producers than almost anything that could happen. I think that order should not have been issued at this time. A great many of these things could have been left out that are not necessarily war measures. At a time when we should have unity of feeling and action in this country, when the people should be in harmony with their Government, and all interested in winning the war, we should not unwisely and unnecessarily irritate them with disturbing legislation.

Now, in reference to rate making: It is not necessary in this bill. It ought not to have been mentioned in the bill. The Interstate Commerce Commission should have been permitted to exercise its authority as heretofore. All we ought to have done in this case was to have put the President in the place of the railroad owners. He should have the same authority as a railroad owner. If he wants to increase rates, let him petition for an increase of rates the same as the railroad owners do now, and let that rate be subject to challenge before it goes into effect.

Of course, in the compromise we provided that the President might initiate rates, but he could put them into immediate effect, and afterwards the commission, upon complaint, could investigate as to their justness and reasonableness. Even this, however, is disturbing to the people.

I repeat there was no occasion for irritating the people of this country over a question that was not a war measure. Therefore I wished to leave the rate-making power where it was, giving the President absolute power in the operation of the roads, because the only question involved was a question of finance anyway, and we had provided $500,000,000 and placed it almost without check in the hands of the Executive, and he certainly could have cared for any deficiency of revenue that could not have been obtained through the Interstate Commerce Commission in the regular way.

Mr. President, these were the three things, I repeat, which demanded and received the greatest consideration on the part of the committee. We settled them with a sort of a compromise, which, I repeat, was satisfactory to no one. No one, not a member of the committee, was satisfied with the proposition, and yet the Secretary of the Treasury and his representatives insisted that we must do something, so the compromise was the result.

Mr. President, thus far what I have said is of little consequence to you. It is my opinion. I would now like to discuss the bill itself in detail for a few minutes, if I could have the attention of the Senators. Otherwise, it is of absolutely no use for me to discuss it, because I shall speak with a desire to convince Senators that the measure is imperfectly drawn and does not even convey the ideas which its advocates believe it does, and I think that if Senators understood the situation thoroughly they would adopt the substitute which I have offered. This does not attempt to change the principles of the bill. I do not incorporate in it practically anything new other than what is included in the bill itself. I have not attempted to engraft on it my ideas of what a bill on this subject should be, but my sole purpose is to make clear what we are attempting to do, and especially to have the committee understand what it did, because I am sure they have not studied the bill carefully.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just let me finish this statement, and then I will yield to the Senator.

I repeat, the bill was not prepared by any Senator or any committee of the Senate. It came to us ready-made, and then we amended it and talked it over to some extent; and then the scrivener, the man outside who had made the bill, took our suggestions home with him and brought back the amendments prepared; and the bill as finally patched up was never before our committee in its present form.

We discussed only the main contested features. The connecting matter, the related matters, were not given very serious consideration by the committee. Therefore I have seen fit, not alone, to prepare a proposed substitute. I have taken expert counsel in reference to the matter. When I read the bill by myself, trying to find out exactly what we had done, I was troubled. So I invited an expert, a man who is familiar with drafting and interpreting legislation, to spend time with me to go over the bill, in order that I might know whether I was right or wrong. He made valuable suggestions. As a result of that, I had prepared the substitute, and am now going to offer my suggestions as to why the substitute ought to be adopted as a basis for amendment.

Now I gladly yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator referred a moment ago to the rate-making power. He said that it is better, according to his notion, to leave it entirely in the hands of one individual. I have not heard that matter dwelt upon by any of those who have discussed the question. The fact is that one of the main reasons why the Government took over the roads was to have the power to route freight wherever it thought it could be more expeditiously sent.

Under the law as it now stands, in reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the shipper has the right to route his freight. He, therefore, can calculate what his tariff or freight charges are going to be and what his goods will cost him. Now, the fundamental principle of this bill is to give to the Director General the right to route the freight by whatever route he sees fit in order to expedite the shipment and to avoid congestion. That necessarily puts into his hands the power and right to change the rate to the shipper.

The Director General having the power to disrupt all the routing that was the right of the shipper before the Government took over the roads in order to avoid and to remedy the very condition that we were confronted with—namely, congestion—that necessarily entailed a change of tariff and, perhaps, a hardship on the shipper; and we thought that we must give him the power to initiate a rate, if he saw fit, to try to meet the burden that he might impose upon a shipper; and, if it was not found fair and just, then we left the matter to the adjudication of the court that we have established, namely, the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I thought that should be said in justice to those who have not studied the subject and do not appreciate the fact that the Director General now has the power to change rates by virtue of having the power to change routes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very glad the Senator has made that suggestion, although, with all due deference to him, I do not think it amounts to anything, because I do not believe that emergency will arise. The number of such cases will be infinitesimal. The rates now in existence are the same, within certain territories, over whatever road the shipment is made. You may take it off from road A and put it on to road B, and consign it to the same destination and you will pay the same rate. But even if some isolated shipper should be obliged to pay a little greater freight rate, it inself would be infinitesimal compared with the possibilities that will be imposed upon the shippers of the country under this bill, because this provision is in the measure not to cover such cases as that suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, but to allow the Director General to make rates for the railroads which they could not secure from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, it is expressed in the terms of the bill that where the emergency demands he may change the rate; and surely, speaking for myself and I think some other members of the committee, I had in view the fact that we desired the Interstate Commerce Commission to maintain its present power as far as the circumstances would justify, and only extended it to meet the condition which necessarily will arise under the illustration that I used.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator understands, does he not, that when the bill came to us the Interstate Commerce Commission had no power at all in the matter?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, I understand that. I am talking about the action of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And the only thing that we who sought to preserve the Interstate Commerce Commission could finally secure was a compromise. The carriers are to secure through this emergency war legislation that which they could not get through the commission. A few months will demonstrate whether or not I am speaking correctly on the subject, and what will occur to rates and to wages throughout the United States.

I think it is a serious mistake to make an attack upon the Interstate Commerce Commission after 30 years' experience in building up a system of rates which has adjusted transportation matters to a great extent between different parts of the country, and upon which business has been established. It occurs to me that we are trifling with—nay, more than that, we are inflaming the shippers and consumers of this country who must pay the freight. Your mail, like mine, is undoubtedly full of protests from men who know what the real situation is.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him whether this subject was submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission, or to any member of it, by the committee?

Mr. TOWNSEND. A member of the commission, Mr. Anderson, was before our committee practically all of the time, and was the chief advocate of the bill. He drew it under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. THOMAS. He is one of the new members, is he not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. One of the new members; in fact, the new member. He had more to do with this bill than any other living man, and no advocate could have served his client better than Mr. Anderson served the Secretary of the Treasury. When he was convinced or requested by the committee to make some change, he took the bill back to his office and brought it to us the next day, when is was more difficult to understand than before.

Mr. President, I wish I might indulge the hope that Senators could take the bill as introduced, and the substitute as presented by me, and, as I point out the places, determine whether I am right or wrong, whether my argument is specious, or whether there is some foundation to what I may say. I wish to state that many of the changes which I advocate are not very material, but they clearly improve the bill; some of them are vital. The substitute will be more easily interpreted, more readily understood; and in some places I insist, as I shall show, that the bill does not convey at all the meaning that the committee intended it to convey.

I know that it may be a vain thing for me even to hope that this amendment will be substituted for the committee bill, although it means the same thing that we intended the committee bill to mean, and is certainly clearer. There ought not, however, to be any pride of authorship on the part of anybody, because I do not know of anybody connected with the Congress who could with much authority claim the authorship of the pending measure. It might not be satisfactory to the scrivener who did draw it to have this substitution made, but I submit that that is not quite sufficient reason for us to refuse to do the thing that we think ought to be done. I ask no credit for preparing and introducing the substitute. I had most efficient help. I want the bill we pass to express the intent of Congress.

And now, Mr. President, I will call to the attention of Senators some of what seems to me to be defects in the pending bill to the provisions of the substitute which remedy these defects.

SECTION 1.

Page 1, lines 3 and 4: Inasmuch as the bill here limits the term "Federal control," wherever used in the act, to mean possession already taken over, it is doubtful whether the provision beginning on page 10, line 25, which seeks to extend the provisions of the act to roads taken over after the passage of the act, is effective for that purpose. To remove all doubt, and to bring both provisions together where they belong, the substitute bill in section 2—page 1, line 7, to page 2 line 5—defines "Federal control" so as to cover the case of all railroads now or hereafter taken over.

Page 1, lines 5 to 7: The President is here authorized to make the agreement with the "carrier," but "carrier" is defined to mean "system of transportation"; that is, the thing taken by the United States. Obviously the agreement must be made with some legal person. The only person with whom an agreement will be binding will be the person who would have been entitled to possession, use, and control of the system of transportation during the period of Federal control, if such control had not been assumed by the United States. If no agreement is made with such person, he has a right, under the Constitution, to demand just compensation, no matter what agreements the United States may have made with anyone else. The matter becomes of the highest importance in the case of a road operated by carrier A under a lease from corporation B. If such a lease expires during the period of Federal control, it is obvious that carrier A should not be entitled to any annual sum from the United States thereafter, and yet the bill provides—page 1, lines 8 to 9—that "during the period of Federal control" carrier A shall receive the annual sum agreed upon. The substitute bill, in section 3, provides that agreements must be made with the "owner," which term by section 2 of the substitute—page 2, lines 6 to 16—is defined as the person who during any portion of the period of Federal control would be entitled to possession, use, and control of the railroad in the absence of Federal control. Section 2 of the substitute also provides in effect that no one can get any payments beyond a time when his rights would have expired if Federal control had not been taken.

Page 1, lines 7 and 8: The bill here authorizes agreements with any carrier "making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission." The authority to agree should be limited to the case of railroads which during the three-year period ending June 30, 1917, made such returns, for it is only in such cases that the most important data on which to base the agreement—i. e., the average income during such three-year period—can be ascertained. This defect is remedied in the substitute bill (p. 2, lines 19–21).

Page 1, lines 9 and 10: It is here provided that the carrier agrees to "receive as just compensation" a certain annual sum. Obviously this is only one of the elements of just compensation, others being the return on additions, and so forth, made during Federal control, the loss accruing from such additions, and so forth. The substitute bill in section 3 (p. 7, lines 7–9) provides that the agreement shall contain a clause that the agreement and its performance shall be accepted as just compensation.

Page 1, line 10, and following lines: "Not exceeding an annual sum * * * equivalent, as nearly as may be, to its average annual railway operating income * * * for the three years ended June 30, 1917." Evidently what is meant, or should be meant, is that the Interstate Commerce Commission having determined the average income, the President should have discretion to agree on an annual sum not exceeding such average income. The force of "equivalent, as nearly as may be," is not apparent, for granting that it may be difficult to determine what the average income was, still the bottom of page 2 makes the certificate of the Interstate Commerce Commission conclusive as to such amount. This confusion is straightened out in the substitute bill (p. 3, lines 1–2), by which the agreement is to be to pay "an annual sum, to be fixed in the agreement, not exceeding the average annual railway operating income."

Page 1, lines 10 and 11: "Herein called standard return." This is unfortunate phraseology, for there is nothing "standard" about it. If applied to the amount which the carrier is to receive under the agreement the term might have some application, but as used here it refers to the "annual sum * * * equivalent, as nearly as may be, to its average annual operating income." What the carrier is to receive is some sum "not exceeding" this "standard return." No good reason can be seen for using such an expression, and the substitute bill does not employ the term, as its use is likely to lead to confusion. As a matter of fact, in every place in which it is used in the reported bill its use leads to the wrong result, as will be pointed out hereafter.

Page 2, line 1: "Pro rata for any fractional year." This idea should be repeated wherever an annual sum is to be paid during Federal control, e. g., in connection with page 2, lines 8 to 13, in none of which places is this safeguard imposed by the bill. The substitute bill takes care of this situation once for all (p. 5, lines 3–5) instead of repeating it several times. The substitute also avoids the use of the term "fractional year," which, to say the least, is an unusual method of expression.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I wish simply to inquire of the distinguished Senator, who is a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which had under consideration and reported the bill pending, if he submitted these various amendments, many of them rather striking, to that committee and discussed them before the committee, to take the judgment of the committee upon them?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not, and I stated why I did not before the Senator came in evidently. This bill was up for consideration. The committee spent a large portion of its time in discussing two or three points in the bill, which I dwelt upon to some extent a while ago. The bill was drawn by the Treasury Department, or under the direction of the Treasury Department. I suppose most of the committee assumed that an immaterial point, or what seemed to be immaterial at the time, was all right. We were working under pressure. The bill was reported, I am sorry to say, without the consideration that ought to have been given it after it was finally drafted and as it was finally presented to the Senate. I do not remember ever having seen the bill as it was finally drawn until I received it on my desk after it had been introduced and reported.

Mr. STONE. But I assume the Senator saw the bill while it was still pending before the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The bill just as it is here, as introduced in the House, was never before the committee to be considered.

Mr. STONE. There was a bill before the committee?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There was a bill.

Mr. STONE. And the Senator is a member of the committee?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right.

Mr. STONE. He was present when it was being considered. The bill before the Senate is the one the committee reported.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; the Senator has guessed right.

Page 2, lines 3 to 6: It is doubtful what the framers of the bill had in mind when they put in this language in the parentheses. Possibly the intention was that the agreement was to be made with a "system" such as the Pennsylvania Railroad, and from this point of view it was necessary to include all the income of constituent lines. But, as pointed out above, the agreement can only be effective if made with the "owner" of the property taken over. If, for example, the Pennsylvania Railroad controls by stock ownership line A, and line A still makes operating returns, the right to the possession, use, and control of line A is vested in that corporation and the agreement must be made with it. The effect of the language in the bill would be that the Pennsylvania Railroad would have its compensation increased by this amount, while the United States might be compelled in a suit to pay line A for its property taken. If, on the other hand, line A is consolidated with the Pennsylvania Railroad, so that the former has made no operating returns and has lost its corporate identity, it is obvious that the agreement must be with the Pennsylvania Railroad, and the latter is entitled to have counted in its income the income derived from line A. The substitute bill (p. 3, lines 12–23) meets this situation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Under the bill as drawn, if the President finds the Pennsylvania Railroad controlling, either through stock ownership or otherwise, a whole system of railroads, and says "I will make the agreement with you as a system," he can do it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Suppose that line A is a part of the system and the majority of the stock is owned by the Pennsylvania, and it makes returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not make the slightest difference.

Mr. TOWNSEND. You say it does in the bill. The point I make is that while we intend that the Pennsylvania Railroad shall have the compensation for that system provided, it does not make operating returns for branch line A, but if line A does make returns, then it has a right to compensation under the bill.

Page 2, lines 5 and 6: Under this, either the first or last date, according to the ordinary rules for the computation of time, would be excluded. The substitute bill, therefore (p. 3, line 15), inserts the words "both inclusive," as it obviously is the intention that the whole period should be included.

Page 2, line 10: "To be fixed by the President." What is a fair rate would seem to be properly a subject of agreement, and it seems better to use the language of the substitute bill (p. 3, line 24), "an agreed percentage."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I notice in line 10, on page 2, the per centum is to be fixed by the President "upon the cost of any additions or betterments, less retirements." Does the bill make any provision anywhere else as to how the retirements are to be ascertained?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Nowhere else.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, I think the Senator's criticism is absolutely conclusive upon the subject.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Page 2, lines 13 to 17: In the computation of the average income no provision is made in the bill for excluding the income from street railway lines which are by the President's proclamation expressly left outside of Federal control, although part of a system taken over. The substitute bill (p. 3, lines 8–12) remedies this apparent oversight.

Page 2, lines 17 to 24: Here again is an example of the unfortunate consequence of the use of the term "standard return." It is provided that the "standard return" shall be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission. As pointed out above, "standard return" is an annual sum equivalent as nearly as may be to the average income. Lines 21 to 23 provide that the certificate of the Interstate Commerce Commission is to be conclusive as to the "average annual railway operating income," while its certificate is only to state the "standard return." Obviously the certificate should be conclusive only as to the matter it certifies, and it is equally obvious that the average income is the matter it should certify. The substitute bill (p. 4, line 21; p. 5, line 2) remedies this confusion.

Page 2, line 18: No provision is made here for the ascertainment of the amount of the "retirements" which by line 11 is to be deducted from cost of additions and betterments made during the six months ending December 31, 1917. No reason is apparent why the Interstate Commerce Commission should not ascertain this amount. The substitute bill (p. 4, line 23) so provides.

Page 2, line 20: The Interstate Commerce Commission is required by the bill to ascertain the cost of additions, and so forth, "from the reports, books, and other pertinent data of such carrier." This seems an unwise limitation, and the substitute bill (p. 4, line 24) permits the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain these facts in the most effective manner from any source.

Page 2, line 24, to page 3, line 5: This provision is limited in its application to railroads with which an agreement is made, for in other cases there can be no "standard return" the excess over which is to be paid into the Treasury. In no place in the bill is provision made for the case of nonagreeing roads, which is a serious omission, for unless it is definitely made clear that all revenues from operation are United States property, it will be perfectly possible for any nonagreeing railroad which is receiving a large revenue from greatly increased traffic that can not to be diverted from its lines to insist on keeping all it makes and refrain from any claim for "just compensation." It seems highly desirable in the public interest that the bill should contain a clear and definite statement that all revenues from operation of roads under Federal control are the property of the United States, with an indication of how they should be handled and disbursed. The substitute bill in section 14 (p. 16) takes care of this situation, both as to agreeing and nonagreeing roads.

The provision in the reported bill is open to serious objection even in the cases to which it applies. What is the situation with regard to the part of the revenues not paid into the Treasury? Is it or is it not Government money? Is the part that is to be paid into the Treasury Government money before it is paid in? The bill (p. 3, lines 2–4) provides that "any net railway operating income in excess of such standard return shall be paid into the Treasury." Probably the intention was that the railroad could retain out of operating revenues an amount equal to the sum which under the agreement it was to receive as just compensation, but this language is far from conveying such a meaning. In the first place, the compensation is by the bill computed with reference to the "railway operating income," in ascertaining which under the Interstate Commerce Commission accounting system "leased road rents" and "miscellaneous rents" are excluded, while such rents are reckoned in the computation of "net railway operating income." It is apparent, therefore, that there is confusion here. Again, the "standard return," as pointed out before, is not the sum received as compensation, but the "annual sum * * * equivalent as nearly as may be to the average annual railway operating income," and the President in the earlier part of this section is authorized to agree on some sum "not exceeding" this as the amount the carrier shall receive. Therefore there will be many cases in which the sum paid as just compensation will be less than the "standard return," yet the provision now under discussion authorizes the railroad to retain out of revenues an amount up to the "standard return," thus giving it more than it is entitled to, while on the other hand it does not allow the road to retain the amount payable as a return upon additions, and so forth, made during the six months ended December 31, 1917, for this amount is not by the bill a part of the "standard return." The reported bill is further confused, for in page 1, line 11, and page 2, line 9, it provides for the payment of the just compensation in "reasonable installments," while in the provision under discussion this theory is abandoned and the railroad allowed to retain it all as it comes in.

All this confusion and inconsistency is remedied in the substitute bill (sec. 14, p. 16), which provides for the payment out of operating revenues of all proper operating expenses, and for the payment of any balance into the Treasury. The sum agreed upon as just compensation will then be paid out of the revolving fund to the railroad in such installments as may be agreed upon. (Substitute bill, p. 5, lines 6–8.)

Page 3, line 6, to page 4, line 3: This paragraph contains many defects, all of which are remedied in the substitute bill in section 3, subdivisions (3) and (4) (p. 5, line 22, to p. 6, line 18) and in section 14 (p. 17, lines 4–23):

(a) Page 3, line 6: "Any Federal taxes under the act of October 3, 1917." What is meant is only the taxes under Titles I and II of that act, i. e., the war income tax and war excess-profits tax.

Take the language in line 9, on that page. The language is used, "assessed for the period of Federal control beginning January 1, 1918, or any part of such period." There is no need for such a limitation. It is obviously intended by the makers of the bill that all such war taxes should be paid by the carriers for whatever period assessed. In line 23 and following this part of it is remedied, although it would be simpler to leave out the words just quoted.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course the Senator will recall that the act of October 3, 1917, does not repeal that part of the act of 1916, but is supplementary to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right.

Mr. THOMAS. Consequently, does not the Senator think the act should be amended so as to include taxes assessed under previous as well as succeeding acts?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; my contention is, if we do not specify it under the clause here we would have to pay those taxes. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the able Senator give me his legal opinion? Does the Senator think that this can in any wise change the relation the property of the railroads bears to the general tax laws of our country? Would it not still be subject to taxes as property and according to value as the property of any other citizen or any other road or any other system?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator means State and local taxes?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think that is true.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator mean to infer that he has some doubt the way the bill is constructed whether those taxes would still be preserved intact?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have some doubt of it, as I have attempted to point out, and will continue to show.

(b) Page 3, line 9, "assessed for the period of Federal control, beginning January 1, 1918, or any part of such period." There is no need for such a limitation, as it is obviously intended that all such war taxes should be paid by the carriers for whatever period assessed. In line 23, and following, this is remedied, but it would be simpler to leave out the words just quoted.

(c) Page 3, line 12, "or shall be charged against or deducted from the standard return." In the first place, as several times pointed out, the "standard return" is not a sum to be received by the carrier but merely an arbitrary amount used as a basis of agreeing on just compensation. In the second place, the method intended does not seem wise for it confuses the collection of internal-revenue taxes. It seems better to have such war taxes collected by the Collector of Internal Revenue for the proper district in the ordinary and usual manner, for if such taxes are to be deducted from the sum paid to the carrier it will cause confusion in the accounts of the Internal-Revenue Bureau and affect the estimates of revenue relied upon by the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee.

Now, on page 3, line 12——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator have in mind the amendment which is incorporated in the bill reserving to a State and the political subdivisions of a State the taxing power as it existed prior to the assumption of Government control?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] asked my legal opinion about what we can do and I was giving it, but to make assurance doubly sure we particularly provide in the bill that the State may tax as heretofore.

On page 3, line 12, the bill reads:

(d) Page 3, lines 13 and following: This seems a very incomplete statement. Who, for example, is to pay the Federal income tax of 2 per cent or the capital-stock tax imposed by section 407 of the act of September 8, 1916, neither of which taxes seem to come within the terms here used?

(e) Page 3, lines 14 to 15: "For the period of Federal control or any part thereof." Strictly construed, this would mean that if a tax were assessed for the year beginning March, 1917, the United States would have to pay it all, since it was assessed for "a part" of the period of Federal control. There seems need of a more careful provision for apportionment of the taxes in such cases. The substitute bill (p. 6, lines 5–12, and p. 17, lines 17–23) contains such a provision.

(f) Page 3, lines 18 to 22: Who is to pay the taxes referred to in this parenthetical clause? They are excluded from the taxes the Government is to pay, but the rest of the paragraph contains in two places an express statement as to what taxes the carrier is to pay. Probably what was intended was that the carrier should pay these taxes, but inasmuch as such expenditures are usually considered additions to capital, it was probably intended that they should be dealt with in the same manner as expenditures for additions and betterments and a fair return allowed upon them, but the bill is silent on this matter. This method is adopted in the substitute bill (p. 4, lines 10–16, and p. 14, lines 16–22).

(g) Page 3, line 22: "Shall be paid out of the revenues." If such revenues are insufficient, provision should be made for use of the revolving fund for this purpose. This is done in the substitute bill (p. 6, lines 3–5, and p. 18, lines 8–11).

(h) Page 3, line 25: "For the period prior to January 1, 1918." This is clearly wrong as to roads hereafter taken over, which should pay all taxes for the period preceding Federal control of such road.

(i) Inasmuch as the "railway operating income," which is used as a basis in agreeing on just compensation, is ascertained under the accounting system of the Interstate Commerce Commission by deducting such taxes as are chargeable to "railway tax accruals," it seems apparent that the taxes which are now to be paid out of operating revenue should be of exactly the same character except as to war taxes. This method is adopted in the substitute bill (p. 5, line 22, to p. 6, line 18, and p. 17, lines 4–23), thus simplifying this confused and ambiguous paragraph.

(j) Nowhere in the bill is there any provision as to the payment of taxes in the case of nonagreeing roads. It seems highly undesirable to leave this important matter unsettled. If the courts should hold, as seems not unlikely, that the United States in such cases must pay all taxes properly chargeable to operating expenses, the United States might find itself burdened with the payment of the railroad's war taxes. The substitute bill (p. 17, lines 4–23) provides that ordinary operating taxes shall be paid out of operating revenues or the revolving fund, but that war taxes shall be paid by the railroads.

Page 4, lines 4 to 17: Nowhere in the bill is there any provision for maintenance and depreciation in the case of a nonagreeing road. The substitute bill, in section 6 (p. 12), contains a pledge by the United States to return the roads in as good condition as when taken over or to pay the loss accruing from a failure to make good the pledge. While the court might include such an item in its award, it is probably well to insert such a provision, if only as a fulfillment of the President's promise to the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. KING. Relative to the last observation made by the Senator, I desire to ask, do I understand him to say that the bill reported by the committee makes no provision for making necessary repairs in order to keep a road in operation in cases where there is no agreement?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It makes no provision for maintenance or depreciation of nonagreeing roads, although, as generally understood, I think the Government probably would have to keep the roads up; that it would probably have to pay for that, and would have to pay the taxes, though the probabilities are that the Government could not recover them against the railroads, because they would be voluntary contributions.

Mr. KING. Unless such taxes could be taken into account in the courts when the question of determining the value of the use was being considered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, I do not know whether what the Government had put in could be taken into consideration at that time; but we can include in the pending bill a provision that if the roads accept the benefits which we confer upon them the agreement shall be binding or this provision shall be binding upon them.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit another inquiry, which is scarcely germane, perhaps?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator, if his substitute is not accepted, offer any portions of the substitute as amendments to the bill, in order to cover the objections which he is urging?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall try to do so, but if the Senator—and I think he has not been able to do so—would take the substitute and the original bill, he would see how different portions of the bill have been connected and brought together in the substitute. Some of them refer to conditions in several places of the bill and bring them together. They are all corrected and made clear and intelligible. I am here to assert that, with one or two single exceptions, there is not a provision in the substitute that would not be accepted by the entire committee if it had time to consider it, for it conveys practically the ideas which they have sought to convey in the bill. I am not trying to write my ideas into a new bill, for I would change many of these things if I were writing a bill of my own; but I am trying to make intelligible the bill which we have already before us, so that just exactly what our meaning is will be clear.

Page 4, line 9: "The property shall be returned to each carrier." As "carrier" is defined to mean a system of transportation, this clause in effect provides that the property shall be returned to itself. Furthermore, it is apparent that the property should be returned to the person who is entitled thereto at the termination of Federal control. This may or may not be the same person who had possession at the time of the taking. The substitute bill (p. 8, line 22, and p. 12, line 5) remedies this defect.

Page 4, line 14: "By each carrier." The substitute bill (p. 9, line 3) substitutes the words "in connection with such railroad or system," for the reason that the owner with whom the agreement is made may not be the same corporation which operated the road during the three-year period.

Page 4, line 20: The reference to the act of August 29, 1916, is too broad. That act includes, for example, provisions relating to the Council of National Defense, and an amendment and reenactment of the Articles of War. What is meant is that portion of such act which authorizes the President to assume control over railroads. It is so stated in the substitute bill (p. 7, lines 12–19).

Page 5, line 1 to 14: Owing to many apparent errors in these lines (referred to in the next few paragraphs) these lines have been rewritten in the substitute bill (p. 7, line 23 to p. 8, line 15) so as to carry out the intent and make the paragraph more easily understood.

Page 5, line 2: "Nondividend-paying carrier." This is ambiguous, as it may mean a carrier paying no dividends at the time of the passage of the bill, or at the time of the agreement, or during the 3-year period used as a basis of computation. Since the last alternative is what was intended, the substitute bill (p. 7, lines 24–25) so states, using the words "railroad or system of transportation" in place of "carrier."

Page 5, line 5: The clause beginning in this line and ending with the word "thereof," in line 8, is meaningless, probably owing to clerical errors or misprints. The word "where," in line 5, should be "because" and the word "when," in line 6, should be "were." In line 5 the words "betterments" and "road extensions" should be inserted in lieu of the word "improvements," as they are used in connection with "additions" in all other places in the bill. In lines 6 and 7 the words "net operating railway income" do not represent what was probably meant, viz, "average annual railway operating income," for the latter is the most important basis for computing the just compensation.

Page 5, line 8: Before the word "other" should be inserted the words "because of."

Page 5, line 9: "So exceptional as to make the basis of earnings hereinabove provided for plainly inequitable as a fair measure of just compensation." Inasmuch as the "basis of earnings" (viz, the average annual railway operating income) is not by the earlier part of the bill made "a fair measure" of just compensation, but only one of the elements thereof (others being, for example, the return on additions, and so forth, made during the six months ended December 31, 1917), the language here used seems erroneous.

Page 5, lines 11–14: If the average income is inequitable as an element of just compensation, the President should substitute in lieu of that element such an amount as he thinks fair, and not throw aside the whole agreement and make a totally different one, as is here provided.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, the attention of the committee has already been called to certain grammatical errors or, perhaps, misprints. On line 5, where the word "where" appears, being the third word, it should be stricken out and the words "because of" inserted; in line 6, where the word "when" occurs, the word "where" should be substituted; and then on line 8, where the word "other" occurs, the words "because of any" should be inserted. The whole paragraph will then be thoroughly intelligible.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have just been saying as much.

SECTION 2.

Page 5, line 15: "No such agreement." Grammatically, this refers to an agreement under the last paragraph, with a "nondividend-paying carrier." What is meant, of course, is "no agreement under section 1." The substitute bill, in section 4, page 9, corrects this ambiguity.

Page 5, line 16: "Carrier while under Federal control." Inasmuch as the bill defines "carrier" to mean a "system of transportation," the payment here referred to can not be made. The substitute bill, in section 4, page 9, uses the phrase "owner of any railroad or system of transportation under Federal control," the term "owner" being suitably defined by section 2 of the substitute (p. 2, lines 6–16).

Page 5, line 18: "Not exceeding 90 per cent of the estimated annual amount of just compensation." In case of an owner of a road with whom the President is authorized to agree under section 1 it seems only right that he should be limited, in case of failure to agree, to the payment of 90 per cent of the annual amount which he is authorized under section 1 to agree that the owner shall receive. In cases where there is no authority to make an agreement under section 1—that is, in the case of roads which did not make operating returns during the three years ending June 30, 1917—there obviously can be no limit to the voluntary payment under this section. The substitute bill (p. 9, lines 14–18) remedies this defect in the reported bill.

Page 5, lines 21 to 23: This clause is open to two objections: (a) If the Court of Claims finds that the owner was entitled to a certain sum on a past date, and is now entitled to that sum with 5 per cent interest from that date to the date of the award, this provision would give a bonus of 1 per cent to the owner over what the court has expressly found to be fair and just. This does not seem desirable. (b) If, on the other hand, the court finds that 7 per cent was a fair rate of interest, the attempt on the part of Congress to limit it to 6 per cent would be ineffective under the familiar doctrine that the ascertainment of just compensation is a judicial function. It should be noted that the interest referred to here is not interest on the award of the court, running from that date until actually paid, which might be regulated by Congress. On the contrary, the interest here referred to is interest from the time the principal sum became due down to the date of the award and is just as essential a part of the just compensation as the principal sum. The substitute bill, therefore, leaves out this clause.

Page 5, lines 24 and 25: The only theory upon which this clause can be legally rested is that the acceptance of payments under this section is an implied acceptance of all its provisions. It seems better to state this definitely, and the substitute bill (p. 9, lines 19–25) does this. The language of the reported bill is also highly indefinite as to the time when the interest on excess payments begins to run. Since the payments here referred to are annual, the difficulties in determining this question are apparent. The substitute bill leaves the date to be fixed in the proceedings brought to determine the just compensation.

SECTION 3.

Page 6, line 1, to page 7, line 7: Throughout this section the bill uses the word "carrier." For reasons before pointed out, the substitute bill (pp. 10 and 11) uses the word "owner," which is defined by section 2 of the substitute (p. 2, lines 6–16).

Page 6, lines 7 to 12: The power here given is without means of enforcement. The substitute bill (p. 10 lines 13–24) inserts a provision giving the board the right to call upon the district court of the United States for assistance in case of contumacy. The provision inserted is substantially the same as in the Federal Trade Commission act.

Page 6, line 21: "Available for such agreement as is authorized in section 1." This is somewhat obscure, and the substitute bill (p. 11, line 9) employs the phrase "available for the making of such an agreement as," and so forth.

Page 7, lines 1 to 7: The proceedings in the Court of Claims are to be for the "final ascertainment" of just compensation. Inasmuch as some of the elements of just compensation—for example, return on additions, and so forth—can not be in all cases ascertained in advance, it would seem wise to provide that the court may make a temporary award, with power in the parties to appear later and have adjudicated their rights growing out of conditions arising thereafter. Such a provision is included in the substitute bill (p. 11, lines 21–25).

SECTION 4.

Page 7, lines 8 to 20: The effect of the language in lines 8 to 10 is that the just compensation "shall be increased" by a fair return upon additions, and so forth, even though the President has agreed under section 3, or the Court of Claims under that section, has adjudged that an amount representing such fair return shall be included in the just compensation. It clearly was not the intent of the framers of the bill to bring about this result, though it is essential that the owner should in some way get a fair return on his money expended for additions, and so forth. The substitute bill remedies this defect by dividing the subject matter of this section into two parts. It inserts in the agreement section a clause (p. 4, lines 4–20) by which the United States agrees to pay to the owner with whom an agreement is made a fair percentage upon his investments in additions, and so forth, and it inserts, in section 10 (p. 14, lines 5–22), a provision under which the President is authorized, if he deems it just, to pay a nonagreeing owner a similar amount if the agreement made on the findings of the board of referees or the award of the Court of Claims makes no provision therefor.

Page 7, lines 10 and 11: "An amount." Apparently an annual amount during the period of Federal control is meant. It is so provided in the substitute bill (p. 14 lines 8–9, and p. 2, lines 23–24, introducing p. 4, line 4).

Page 7, line 11: "Reasonable rate per centum to be fixed by the President." When is this rate to be fixed? At the time the expenditures are made, or at the time the payments are made by the United States, or at some other time? Is this rate to be fixed for all roads, or a different rate for each, and is it to vary each year? It seems that in the case of expenditures made out of borrowed money the rate should be the same as the rate at which the money is borrowed, and it is so provided in the substitute bill (p. 4, line 16, and p. 14, line 23). In other cases it would seem fair that the rate should be fixed at the time the expenditure is made, and it is so provided in the substitute bill (p. 4, line 19, and p. 14, line 25).

Page 7, lines 12 and 13: How is the "cost" here referred to to be determined? The bill makes no provision. The substitute bill (p. 4, line 22, et seq., and p. 15, lines 1–6) provides for the ascertainment of this cost, as also the amount of retirements, by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Page 7, lines 12 to 16: The insertion in line 13 of the word "upon" makes lines 14–16 limit only "the cost of road extensions" and not "the cost of any additions and betterments," which result, of course, was not intended. The substitute bill (p. 4, lines 5–6, and p. 14, lines 10–11) cures this error.

Page 7, line 14: "to the property of such carrier by the carrier." Assuming that by "carrier" is meant the owner, it seems clear that what is meant instead of "property" is the railroad or system of transportation, for obviously no return should be made in the case of additions and betterments to nonoperating property. The substitute bill (p. 4, lines 6–7, and p. 14, lines 11–12) limits the payments to cases where additions, and so forth, have been made on or in connection with the railroad or system of transportation.

Page 7, line 15: "by the President." Apparently meant to read "by order of the President" for no reason can be seen why a return should be allowed the owner for money expended by the United States. The substitute bill (p. 4, line 8, and p. 14, line 14) corrects this error.

Page 7, line 17: "Additions, improvements, or betterments." This should conform to lines 12–13 and read "Additions, betterments, or road extensions."

Page 7, lines 18 and 19: "Earnings for investment." This apparently is a misprint for "earnings from investments," which phrase is used in the substitute bill (p. 4, line 9, and p. 14, line 15).

SECTION 5.

Page 7, line 21, to page 8, line 3: This section of the bill seems of doubtful validity. The income of the carrier or owner belongs to it, and after the payment of its debts and taxes, and after any expenditures legitimately required by any act passed by Congress or a State legislature under the police power or commerce power, it would seem to be free for the declaration of dividends at the will of the owner. So long as the owner is not operating the road the dissipation of its income in dividends can not affect the carrying on of interstate commerce nor can it prejudice the successful carrying on of the war. Even if dividends may be restricted under the interstate commerce power the section would seem unconstitutional, for it is not limited to roads engaged in interstate commerce—indeed, so long as the United States operates the roads none of them can fairly be said to be engaged in interstate commerce. Even if the section is valid it is ineffective for the penalty of $5,000, imposed by section 11, is not severe enough to compel obedience. The substitute bill remedies this defect by providing (p. 6, line 19, to p. 7, line 6) that in the case of agreeing roads the agreement shall bind the owner to accept all the terms of the act under penalty of suspension or forfeiture of further payments; and in the case of nonagreeing roads by providing (p. 9, lines 19–20) that acceptance of payments under section 4 (which corresponds to sec. 2 of the reported bill) shall constitute an acceptance of all the provisions of the act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator is about to leave the point he has just been discussing, I should like to ask him a question. Do I understand the Senator to say that in the bill reported by the committee there is any restriction upon the directors of any railroad corporation in regard to making such disposition of the standard return as they may see fit?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The bill provides that a company shall not declare any dividend in excess of what it had declared during the prescribed three years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I recall the fact that there was a time in the history of the Senate when there was a good deal of resentment expressed here when bills were prepared at another place and sent here to be introduced. It will also be remembered that it now appears to be the fashion to have bills prepared elsewhere, and sent here for introduction. It seems to me that the Senator from Michigan is drawing an indictment against whoever framed this bill that might well cause us to pause, and to ask if we had not better write our own bills in the future.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Page 7, line 21: "No carrier." Since a system of transportation can not declare a dividend, the use of the word "carrier" is erroneous, for section 1 defines "carrier" to mean a system of transportation. The substitute bill in section 12 (p. 15, line 22) uses the word "owner," which section 2 of the substitute (p. 2, lines 6 to 16) has defined.

Page 7, line 23: "Regular rate of dividends during the three years," and so forth. Suppose in 1915, 4 per cent was paid, 5 per cent in 1916, and 6 per cent in 1917. There could not be said to be paid a "regular" rate. It is not seen why the word "average" should not be used in place of "regular." This is done in the substitute bill (sec. 12, p. 15).

Page 7, line 23: "Its." This seems erroneous, for the owner whose payment of dividends is here sought to be restricted may not have owned the system during the three-year period. This is corrected by the substitute bill (sec. 12, p. 15).

Page 7, line 25: The proviso seems needless repetition and has been omitted in section 12 of the substitute bill.

SECTION 6.

Page 8, line 4, to page 9, line 17: This section deals with so many different subjects that it was deemed best in the substitute bill to split it up into several sections (secs. 7, 8, 9, 11, and sec. 3, subdivision (2)).

Page 8, lines 5 and 6: "Out of the Public Treasury from any funds not otherwise appropriated." This differs from the long-established phrase "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and the latter phrase is used in the substitute bill (p. 12, lines 14 and 15).

Page 8, lines 6 to 8: This may be construed by the Comptroller of the Treasury as an appropriation of the operating income, but it is better to make it certain, as is done in the substitute bill (p. 12, lines 16 and 17).

Page 8, lines 6 and 7: "And funds available from any operating income of said carriers." By "available" is probably meant the portion of the operating income paid into the Treasury under the provision found in page 3, lines 2 to 5. But that provision is limited to the case of the agreeing roads, and the language here quoted is not sufficient to constitute the operating income of the nonagreeing roads' Government moneys, however sufficient it may be to appropriate it if it were Government money. The substitute bill (p. 12, line 16) appropriates for use in the revolving fund only the excess of revenues over disbursements, for the reasons pointed out in connection with the criticism of the reported bill's provisions in page 2, line 24, to page 3, line 5.

Page 8, line 9: "Expenses of Federal control." The meaning of this is doubtful. By page 2, line 24, to page 3, line 5, the agreeing carrier is allowed to pay the operating expenses out of operating revenues. Probably what is meant here is that the revolving fund may be used to make up any deficit in operating expenses. The substitute bill (p. 18, lines 8–11) so provides.

Page 8, lines 9 and 10: "So far as necessary the amount of just compensation." The substitute bill (p. 12, lines 21–24) pledges the United States to appropriate any further sum necessary to pay the whole amount of just compensation.

Page 8, line 11. "Terminals." It is not apparent why this word is inserted in connection with "motive-power, cars," etc., all of which are personal property and at the end of Federal control can be disposed of as Congress may provide. But terminals, if on the property of the carrier, can not be so treated. In this connection it should be noted that lines 15 to 18 and following lines authorize the President to make additions, betterments, etc.; but, except as to terminals, he is given no authority to use for such purpose the revolving fund or any other Government moneys. The substitute bill therefore omits "terminals" from the list of rolling stock, etc., which Congress is to dispose of after Federal control is ended, but inserts a provision (p. 13, lines 8–11) authorizing the President to use the revolving fund for the making of any additions, etc. (which would clearly include terminals), necessary or desirable for war purposes or in the public interest. This insertion seems clearly desirable, for in case of additions of no use to the carrier the latter, if obliged to pay for them out of its own funds, could immediately come into court and recover the amount expended by virtue of the provision found in the reported bill, page 9, lines 3 to 8, thus putting the United States to the expense of a lawsuit.

Page 8, lines 15 to 18: The authority to order the carrier to make additions, and so forth, is of doubtful validity. Suppose the carrier refuses? This defect is cured by the substitute bill which provides (p. 6, line 19, to p. 7, line 6) that the agreement shall contain a clause binding the carrier to conform to all the provisions of the act or orders thereunder, under penalty of suspension or forfeiture of payments under the agreement. It also provides in the case of nonagreeing roads (p. 9, lines 19–25) that any acceptance of benefits under section 4 (corresponding section to sec. 2 of the reported bill) shall constitute an acceptance of all the provisions of the act.

Page 8, line 16. "Property of any carrier." Assuming that "carrier" means owner, it would seem that "property" is the wrong word, for the assumption of Federal control is not an assumption of rights to nonoperating property. The substitute bill (p. 13, lines 20–21) uses the phrase "railroad or system of transportation."

Page 9, lines 3 to 8: The term "carrier" is wrongly used in these lines. The loss is suffered by the owner of the system, and the agreement must be made with him. Again, the loss may consist of a permanent damage to the system, thus giving rights to the lessor, although the lease does not expire till after the end of Federal control. Provision should be made to cover the case.

In so far as the loss is due to additions, and so forth, made by the President, there is no provision made here for compensation.

The substitute bill divides this provision into two parts. It inserts a clause in the agreement section (p. 5, lines 9–21) by which the United States agrees to pay losses caused by such additions, and so forth, the amount of the loss to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It also inserts (sec. 11, p. 15, lines 7–20) a provision authorizing the President, if he thinks it just, to pay such losses, if the agreement made on the findings of the board of referees or the award of the Court of Claims makes no provision therefor.

SECTION 7.

Page 9, lines 18 to 24: The language here employed leaves it doubtful whether the carriers—assuming this to mean the corporations—may, without the approval of the President, issue securities for purposes other than those enumerated. It also is open to the possible construction that they may, without the approval of the President, issue securities even for the purposes named, but as to such securities the President has no power of purchase. The substitute bill in section 13 (p. 16, lines 4–8) provides that owners "may issue only such" securities as the President approves, which is the real intention of this section.

Any doubt as to the validity of this section is removed by the substitute bill, which provides, as to agreeing roads (p. 6, line 19, to p. 7, line 6), that the agreement shall contain a clause by which the owner agrees to be bound by all the terms of the act under penalty of suspension or forfeiture of payments under the agreement, and provides as to nonagreeing roads (p. 9, lines 19–25), that acceptance of any payments under section 4—which corresponds to section 2 of the reported bill—constitutes an acceptance of all the terms of the act.

Page 10, lines 1 to 4: The bill makes no provision as to how these securities are to be held, how voted, and what is to be done with the income therefrom, or with the proceeds of the sale thereof. The substitute bill (p. 16, lines 11–21) provides that securities so purchased shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury; that he shall, under the President's direction, represent the United States in all matters connected therewith; and that the income therefrom and the proceeds of any sales shall be paid into the Treasury—not into the revolving fund, for the securities may be held by the United States long after the expiration of Federal control.

SECTION 8.

Page 10, lines 7 to 17: Appear unchanged in substitute bill as section 15 (p. 18, lines 12–22). This section, while possibly capable of construction as a declaration that all railroad employees are United States employees, is certainly not a sufficiently definite provision on so important a question. The substitute bill in section 16 (p. 18) contains an express declaration that such persons are United States employees, with the limitations (1) that they shall not be exempt from excess-profits tax, (2) that they shall not be entitled to compensation for injuries under the Federal compensation act of September 7, 1916; and (3) that the President may declare any United States statute inapplicable to them, except the employers' liability act.

SECTION 9.

Page 10, lines 18 to 25: These lines seem unnecessary. Strictly construed, they add nothing to what would be true without them. If they are intended or can possibly be construed to do something else, they should be omitted or a more definite provision substituted stating clearly what additional powers it is intended to bestow. The substitute bill omits these lines.

Page 10, line 25, to page 11, line 2: This sentence is omitted in the substitute bill, which in section 2 (p. 1, line 7, to p. 2, line 5) defines "Federal control" to include the case of roads hereafter taken over.

SECTION 10.

Page 11, lines 3 to 10: The method here employed to deal with the questions (1) as to liability to suit and (2) as to what law is applicable to the roads while under Federal control seems too vague and indefinite for the determination of such important questions:

(1) It is clear that, in substance, the roads are being operated by the United States, and since all expenses are in effect being paid out of Government moneys, any suit is in essence a suit against the Government, to bring which the consent of the United States is necessary. To attempt to dodge this question by permitting suits against corporations which are not themselves operating the roads can only lead to confusion. Even though suit is brought against the corporation, it would seem that it would be a valid defense that such corporation had not performed the act alleged as the ground of liability and that the act was in reality performed by the United States, thus defeating the purpose of this section. But if a judgment were obtained there is nothing to prevent the plaintiff from satisfying his judgment out of the carrier's nonoperating property. The bill contains no provision for the payment of judgments out of United States moneys, nor does it provide for the case of accounts and claims unsettled at the beginning or end of Federal control. The substitute bill, in sections 17 and 18 (pp. 20–21), deals with all these matters in what is believed to be a much more satisfactory manner.

(2) There is serious question as to whether the various Federal and State statutes affecting railroads are now by their terms applicable to the United States in its operation of the roads. The interstate-commerce act, for example, by its terms applies only to "common carriers" engaged in interstate commerce. This description does not fit the United States. This doubt is removed by the substitute bill, which (sec. 19, p. 21) declares that all Federal laws applicable to railroads shall be read as if the United States were by their terms expressly subject thereto, but preserves to the President the right to specify any such law as inconsistent with Federal control, except the employers' liability act.

Since Congress has no right to alter State laws, or at least has no right to say that they shall apply to persons to whom they do not apply, the substitute bill (sec. 20, p. 22) uses the device of making all State laws relating to railroads a part of this act and applicable to the United States, with power in the President to declare any of them inapplicable to the United States. But since it is essential that the members of the public may rely on their rights being protected, he is not allowed to alter the law relating to contracts nor to liability for personal injuries, except in so far as such liability rests on statutes providing for the health, comfort, and safety of individuals, which statutes it may well be that military necessities may make it desirable to disregard.

Page 11, line 13 and the following: This paragraph seems defective in that it is applicable to all roads, whether or not under Federal control, and in that it is not limited to the period of Federal control. The substitute bill (sec. 21, p. 23) remedies these omissions and makes slight verbal changes to carry out more clearly the intention.

SECTION 11.

Page 12, lines 3 to 16: These lines are exceedingly verbose and are reduced materially by the substitute bill, section 25, page 26, without omissions of any material words.

Page 12, line 16: The sentence beginning in this line is omitted in the substitute bill, as it appears to be meaningless. Obviously, if each "independent transaction" is a "violation," it is a "separate offense."

Page 12, line 20: The sentence beginning on this line is omitted in the substitue bill, which, in section 16, page 18, declares railroad employees to be United States employees, making this sentence unnecessary. The clause on page 12 of the reported bill, lines 24–25, attempting to make State laws applicable, is, of course, ineffective, as the States will determine for themselves who are subject to their laws. Congress may conceivably prohibit the States from punishing a Federal officer, but it can not undertake to say that a State law shall apply to some one to whom the State court says it does not apply.

SECTION 12.

SECTION 13.

The substitute bill in section 26, page 26, adds a provision declaring the separability of the act in case any part is declared unconstitutional. The importance of such a provision seems apparent in view of the many and complex relationships which are dealt with in the bill. The provision is copied from the act creating the United States Shipping Board.

Now, Mr. President, I have occupied more time of the Senate, and my presentation of the subject has not been interesting. I know that very well. I have not been able to hold the attention of very many Senators, and my task has been a most ungracious one. I have been compelled to act as a critic. I understand that as well as any Senator here; but I have called attention to nothing except what is found in the bill, and if Senators will take the pains to read my statement in to-morrow's RECORD and think it worth while to consider the defects which I have pointed out, I am sure they will agree with me that we ought to adopt the substitute and then let various Senators propose their amendments to it. We will then at least have the basis upon which to construct a bill which will not be the subject of doubt as to meaning and it will be clear in its expressions.

HOUSING OF SHIPYARD EMPLOYEES (S. DOC. 174)—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. RANSDELL. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the bill S. 3389, known as the shipyard housing bill, and I ask unanimous consent to waive the reading of the report. I will say that it is a unanimous report on the part of the conferees of the two Houses. The other House has already agreed to the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to omit the reading of the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire the conference report to be read, as I wish to know what changes have been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the Secretary will read the conference report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert the following:

"That the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation is hereby authorized and empowered within the limits of the amounts herein authorized—

"(a) To purchase, lease, requisition, including the requisition of the temporary use of, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any improved or unimproved land or any interest therein suitable for the construction thereon of houses for the use of employees and the families of employees of shipyards in which ships are being constructed for the United States.

"(b) To construct on such land for the use of such employees and their families houses and all other necessary or convenient facilities, upon such conditions and at such price as may be determined by it, and to sell, lease, or exchange such houses, land, and facilities upon such terms and conditions as it may determine.

"(c) To purchase, lease, requisition, including the requisition of the temporary use of, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any houses or other buildings for the use of such employees and their families, together with the land on which the same are erected, or any interest therein, all necessary and proper fixtures and furnishings therefor, and all necessary and convenient facilities incidental thereto; to manage, repair, sell, lease, or exchange such lands, houses, buildings, fixtures, furnishings and facilities upon such terms and conditions as it may determine to carry out the purposes of this act.

"(d) To make loans to persons, firms, or corporations in such manner, upon such terms and security, and for such time not exceeding ten years, as it may determine to provide houses and facilities for the employees and the families of employees of such shipyards.

"Whenever said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall acquire by requisition or condemnation such property or any interest therein, it shall determine and make just compensation therefor, and if the amount thereof so determined is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to such 75 per cent will make such an amount as will be just compensation for the property or interest therein so taken, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

"That whenever the said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall requisition any property or rights, or upon the filing of a petition for condemnation hereunder, immediate possession may be taken by it of such land, houses, or other property, rights, and facilities, to the extent of the interests to be acquired therein, and the same may be immediately occupied and used, and the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes, providing that no public money shall be expended upon such land until the written opinion of the Attorney General shall be had in favor of the validity of the title nor until the consent of the legislature of the State in which the land is located has been given, shall be, and the same are hereby, suspended as to all land acquired hereunder.

"The power to acquire property by purchase, lease, requisition, or condemnation, or to construct houses, or other buildings, and to make loans, or otherwise extend aid as herein granted shall cease with the termination of the present war with Germany. The date of the conclusion of the war shall be declared by proclamation of the President.

"The word 'person' used herein shall include a trustee, firm, or corporation. The word 'shipyard' shall include any factory, workshop, warehouse, engine works, buildings, or grounds used for manufacturing, assembling, construction, or other process in shipyards and dockyards and discharging terminals, and other facilities connected therewith, now or hereafter used in connection with shipbuilding.

"That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the expenditure of $50,000,000 is hereby authorized, and in executing the authority granted by this act, the said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall not expend or obligate the United States to expend more than the said sum, nor shall any contract for construction be entered into which provides that the compensation of the contractor shall be the cost of construction plus a percentage thereof for profit, unless such contract shall also fix the reasonable cost of such construction as determined by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and provide that upon any increase in cost above the reasonable cost so fixed by such board, the percentage of profit shall decrease as the cost increases in accordance with a rate to be fixed by said board and expressed in the contract. No contract shall be let without the approval of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent said board from contracting for the payment of premiums or bonuses for the speedy completion of the work contracted for: Provided further, That the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall report to Congress on the first Monday in December of each year the names of all persons or corporations with whom it has made contracts and of such subcontractors as may be employed in furtherance of this act, including a statement of the purposes and amounts thereof, together with a detailed statement of all expenditures by contract or otherwise for land, buildings, material, labor, salaries, commissions, demurrage, or other charges in excess of $10,000."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. W. ALEXANDER,
RUFUS HARDY,
E. W. SAUNDERS,
WILLIAM S. GREENE,
GEORGE W. EDMONDS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, subparagraph (d) of the amendment grants authority—to make loans to persons, firms, or corporations in such manner, upon such terms and security, and for such time, not exceeding 10 years, as it may determine to provide houses and facilities for the employees and the families of employees of such ship yards.

That question never was before the Senate, Mr. President. It was not discussed, and it seems to me a rather broad authority to give.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say that the question was before the House and was very thoroughly discussed, and a good deal of testimony was taken in regard to it. The matter was very fully considered by the conferees, and the Senate conferees unanimously agreed with the House conferees. If there is any explanation that the Senator desires about it, I will try to make it; or, if he prefers to have it go over, of course I shall have no objection, except that we ought to act on it as soon as we can. I will state that the Shipping Board is very anxious to get permission to build these houses.

Mr. SMOOT. I want the Senator to understand that I have no object in delaying the conference report; but this is a rather sweeping provision and one that is not guarded in any way. I therefore ask the Senator to let the matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will lie on the table and be printed.

MILITARY AND NAVAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. NELSON the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I now propose the unanimous-consent agreement which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from South Carolina proposes the following unanimous-consent agreement:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered and upon the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and after said hour, 2 o'clock p. m., Thursday, February 21, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from South Carolina, in charge of the bill, to strike out the words "calendar day" and insert "legislative day." I think it is apparent that this bill needs amendment. I think the Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, has amendments to propose. I notice that other Senators have offered amendments—amendments of importance. There is no bill that I know of pending in the American Congress or that has been pending here since this war began that more vitally affects the interests of the American people. I am not talking about war measures, but about business measures. This bill is certainly entitled to careful and full consideration in the Senate.

I recognize the fact that under general debate in the Senate it is very difficult to get careful and full consideration. I believe that so far as considering the bill and adopting amendments is concerned, we accomplish better results when the debate is limited and we consider amendments under the five-minute rule. Therefore, I have no objection whatever to the Senator from South Carolina proceeding along that line; but, as I understand the agreement that is proposed at the desk, it brings the Senate to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule at 2 o'clock on Thursday next. So far, the proposal meets with my approval; I agree with it; but I understand that when Thursday comes we take up the bill at 2 o'clock under the five-minute rule, and must finish it on that calendar day under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that that was not so understood. I think the purpose is then to proceed under the five-minute rule without being limited to the calendar day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not so understand the agreement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I should like to have him amend the unanimous-consent agreement so that there can be no doubt about that. I want to aid the Senator in expediting the consideration of the bill; but I think that we ought to proceed under the five-minute rule to consider every amendment that is offered, if it takes four or five more days to consider it under the five-minute rule. There is no reason why we should not do so. In all probability we will dispose of it in a day or so; but to drive a bill of this importance through the Senate, considering all amendments from 2 o'clock until perhaps 12 o'clock that night, when the Senate will be tired and worn out, I do not think is a just or right way to present the bill to the country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will listen to the reading of the proposed agreement he will see that it does not restrict the final disposition of the bill to any date. The consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule begins on the calendar day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I may have misunderstood the agreement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let us read it carefully:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill.

* * * * * * *

through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and after said hour, 2 o'clock p. m., Thursday, February 21, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to see that a moment, I shall be obliged.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. The agreement does not fix a time for a final vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; it fixes no time for a final vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I may be mistaken in this, but I do not think I am [reading]:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Describing the bill—

That is, leaving out the surplusage in the agreement, it provides that on Thursday, the 21st of February, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote upon this bill to its final disposition. If the Senator will strike out the words "calendar day" and make it read "legislative day," when the time comes to adjourn that night we can take a recess and consider the bill further.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not let it go that way. The agreement as proposed yesterday was that after 2 o'clock on Thursday debate should be limited to 10 minutes upon the bill and 5 minutes upon amendments; but, as everybody knows, there is no distinction between the two things, and each Senator would have an opportunity to speak for 10 minutes. I do not think the limitation of 5 minutes, under the circumstances, is quite reasonable. There have been several very good speeches made upon the bill as a whole. I have given a good deal of attention to this subject, and, while I spoke a long time, and I have no disposition to repeat that performance, I addressed myself entirely to one section of the bill. There are amendments to other sections of the bill, rather fundamental in their character, that could not be discussed in 5 minutes.

I want the Senator from South Carolina to allow the debate to go on for a reasonable time, at any rate, after 2 o'clock on Thursday under a 10-minute rule. I think that the debate from 2 o'clock on Thursday until 6 o'clock on Thursday, if it continues that long—I hope it will not—ought to be under a 10-minute rule instead of a 5-minute rule, and I am willing to take the 5-minute rule after 6 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That will be agreeable to me, Mr. President. What I want to do is to expedite the consideration of the bill. The Senator from Iowa, I am sure, is as sincere as I am in the desire to expedite it. I will take almost any old thing to get something started, somehow, in some way. I should like to have the agreement modified to meet the request of the Senator from Iowa that from 2 o'clock until 6 o'clock on Thursday the speeches shall be limited to 10 minutes each, and thereafter to 5 minutes, until the final disposition of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from South Carolina consents to the substitution of the words "legislative day" for "calendar day."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. CUMMINS. Has it been modified in the way I suggested?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary is endeavoring to modify the agreement to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa that the 10-minute rule shall be applied at 2 o'clock p. m. on Thursday and last until 6 p. m., and thereafter the 5-minute rule shall prevail.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Cummins	Kendrick	Page	Smith, Ga.
Curtis	Kenyon	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Fletcher	King	Poindexter	Smoot
Gallinger	Lewis	Pomerene	Swanson
Gronna	Martin	Ransdell	Thomas
Harding	Myers	Robinson	Tillman
Henderson	New	Shafroth	Underwood
Hitchcock	Norris	Sheppard	Vardaman
Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Simmons	Wadsworth
Kellogg	Overman	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

Mr. MYERS. By reason of ill health, my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is still detained from the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish merely to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] are absent because of personal illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. STERLING, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. HALE, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. HOLLIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. Does the Senator from South Carolina desire to have the unanimous-consent agreement read?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I think not, Mr. President. It is understood.

Mr. STERLING. May we have the proposed agreement read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on the legislative day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that from and after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. up to the hour of 6 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto, and that after the last-named hour on the said last-named calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the consideration of the bill should last after that calendar day, how long may Senators speak?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Five minutes.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina whether he means that that order would convey the privilege of speaking after 6 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LEWIS. After 6 o'clock on Thursday?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. I should like to have a short executive session. I promised to make a committee report which has been in my hands for several days.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator can make it as in open executive session.

Mr. MYERS. Then I will ask unanimous consent, as an executive matter, to make the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. MYERS. Then I ask the Senator to allow us to have a short executive session. I promised to make this report for the Senator from Missouri, who is particularly interested in it. It will take but a minute.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 20, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

TUESDAY, February 19, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Calm as the night, deep as the sea, constant as the sun is Thy love to us, O Father in Heaven. Thy blessings are innumerable and Thou hast saved us from dangers known and from many a peril unrecognized. Save us from habitual complaint, lament, regret. Hold us close to Thee in love, thanksgiving, and trust. And while the storm and the surges of life beat about us, keep us safe upon the Rock of Ages, and defend and bless our dear, dear country. In Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

R. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved lands, houses, and buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that under the unanimous-consent agreement we will take up the railroad bill after the conference report is agreed to?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

The Clerk will report the conference report by title.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the statement.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 319).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3389) "to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert the following:

"That the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation is hereby authorized and empowered within the limits of the amounts herein authorized—

"(a) To purchase, lease, requisition, including the requisition of the temporary use of, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any improved or unimproved land or any interest therein suitable for the construction thereon of houses for the use of employees and the families of employees of shipyards in which ships are being constructed for the United States.

"(b) To construct on such land for the use of such employees and their families houses and all other necessary or convenient facilities, upon such conditions and at such price as may be determined by it, and to sell, lease, or exchange such houses, land, and facilities upon such terms and conditions as it may determine.

"(c) To purchase, lease, requisition, including the requisition of the temporary use of, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any houses or other buildings for the use of such employees and their families, together with the land on which the same are erected, or any interest therein, all necessary and proper fixtures and furnishings therefor, and all necessary and convenient facilities incidental thereto; to manage, repair, sell, lease, or exchange such lands, houses, buildings, fixtures, furnishings, and facilities upon such terms and conditions as it may determine to carry out the purposes of this act.

"(d) To make loans to persons, firms, or corporations in such manner upon such terms and security, and for such time not exceeding 10 years, as it may determine to provide houses and facilities for the employees and the families of employees of such shipyards.

"Whenever said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall acquire by requisition or condemnation such property or any interest therein, it shall determine and make just compensation therefor, and if the amount thereof so determined is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to such 75 per cent will make such an amount as will be just compensation for the property or interest therein so taken, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

"That whenever the said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall requisition any property or rights, or upon the filing of a petition for condemnation hereunder, immediate possession may be taken by it of such land, houses, or other property, rights, and facilities, to the extent of the interests to be acquired therein, and the same may be immediately occupied and used, and the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes, providing that no public money shall be expended upon such land until the written opinion of the Attorney General shall be had in favor of the validity of the title nor until the consent of the legislature of the State in which the land is located has been given, shall be, and the same are hereby, suspended as to all land acquired hereunder.

"The power to acquire property by purchase, lease, requisition, or condemnation, or to construct houses, or other buildings, and to make loans, or otherwise extend aid as herein granted shall cease with the termination of the present war with Germany. The date of the conclusion of the war shall be declared by proclamation of the President.

"The word 'person' used herein shall include a trustee, firm, or corporation. The word 'shipyard' shall include any factory, workshop, warehouse, engine works, buildings, or grounds used for manufacturing, assembling, construction, or other process in shipyards and dockyards and discharging terminals, and other facilities connected therewith, now or hereafter used in connection with shipbuilding.

"That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the expenditure of $50,000,000 is hereby authorized, and in executing the authority granted by this act, the said United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall not expend or obligate the United States to expend more than the said sum, nor shall any contract for construction be entered into which provides that the compensation of the contractor shall be the cost of construction plus a percentage thereof for profit, unless such contract shall also fix the reasonable cost of such construction as determined by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and provide that upon any increase in cost above the reasonable cost so fixed by such board, the percentage of profit shall decrease as the cost increases in accordance with a rate to be fixed by said board and expressed in the contract. No contract shall be let without the approval of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent said board from contracting for the payment of premiums or bonuses for the speedy completion of the work contracted for: Provided further, That the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall report to Congress on the first Monday in December of each year the names of all persons or corporations with whom it has made contracts and of such subcontractors as may be employed in furtherance of this act, including a statement of the purposes and amounts thereof, together with a detailed statement of all expenditures by contract or otherwise for land, buildings, material, labor, salaries, commissions, demurrage, or other charges in excess of $10,000."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill S. 3389, "An act to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes," submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and submitted by the accompanying report:

The House amendment to the bill S. 3389 is agreed to with an amendment, which gives the text of the bill as agreed to by the conferees.

The bill as agreed to authorizes and empowers the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation not only to requisition property for the purposes of the act, but to requisition the temporary use of the property for the purposes of the act; also to provide houses for the use of employees and the families of employees; also, in addition to proper fixtures and furnishings for houses and other buildings for the use of employees and their families, to provide all necessary and convenient facilities incidental thereto.

Paragraph (d) is rewritten, and the Emergency Fleet Corporation is given power to make loans to persons, firms, or corporations in such manner, upon such terms and security, and for such time not exceeding 10 years as it may determine to provide houses and facilities for the employees and the families of employees of such shipyards. Subdivision (d) as it passed the House gave the Emergency Fleet Corporation power to make loans only upon adequate security to persons, firms, or corporations, etc. The conferees are of the opinion that to demand adequate security for all loans made might seriously embarrass the Emergency Fleet Corporation in providing the necessary housing facilities. It is too much to hope there will be no loss to the Government in carrying out this project, and to demand adequate security for every loan made would make it difficult for the Emergency Fleet Corporation to enlist the active cooperation of persons, firms, or corporations in carrying out the purposes of the act. The most we can hope for is that the Emergency Fleet Corporation in making loans will exercise sound discretion and demand the very best security that can be obtained, and the effect of the amendment agreed to in conference is to vest the Emergency Fleet Corporation with large discretion in making loans.

No other material amendment is made to the House amendment in the way of substitute to the Senate bill.

The last paragraph of the House amendment to the Senate bill as agreed to by the conferees is amended to provide that no contract shall be sublet without the approval of the Emergency Fleet Corporation; also, to provide that the report made to Congress shall be made on the 1st day of December of each year instead of on the 1st day of July and January of each year.

The effect of these amendments is apparent and needs no explanation.

J. W. ALEXANDER,
RUFUS HARDY,
E. W. SAUNDERS,
WILLIAM S. GREENE,
GEORGE W. EDMONDS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the bill as agreed to in conference was to all intents and purposes the same as the bill as it passed the House, and I move the previous question.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to subdivision (d), covering the matter of loans, I merely ask, for the guidance of the Shipping Board, as to what the intent of the Congress was. I take it that it was the intention of the conferees, by modifying the language that was adopted by the House, to require security in each instance, but leaving a very wide discretion with the board?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. But in no event should security be dispensed with?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That was clearly the intent, and the only reason we modified the language was because, as framed in the bill, it was too restrictive, but at the time the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offered the amendment it appealed to me very strongly, but upon more mature consideration the conferees were afraid it would be too restrictive.

Mr. LENROOT. All I wanted to say was, that this ought not to be construed as permitting the board to waive security?

Mr. ALEXANDER. On the other hand, we wish them to procure the best security they can.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice the committee has extended the authority of the loans that may be made by the Shipping Board, to provide for loans for houses as carried in the House bill, and also for facilities. Has that any peculiar significance as to authorizing loans for the building of railroads?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no; nothing at all. We might be able to take over a house, and there might be some furniture or fixtures that would be worth while to take over.

Mr. STAFFORD. The idea is that the facilities referred merely to the housing proposition?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; the facilities in connection with the housing, absolutely.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a short question before he does that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask if the amendment which was adopted just before the bill was reported to the House remains?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Green amendment?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; the Green amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It remains in the bill just as it was written in the House. It is not modified at all, except that we provide that no subcontract may be let without the express consent of the Shipping Board. I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution, which I ask to have read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. The unanimous-consent agreement was that nothing was to interfere with the consideration of the railroad bill except conference reports and Calendar Wednesday business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that, but little things that have to do with the running of the House and that will not take but a minute were not included. If this does, the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw it.

Mr. PARK. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 221.

Resolved, That the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic be allowed a clerk at the rate of $6 per diem during the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this is the only committee of the House with legislative jurisdiction which has not been allowed a clerk, and that notwithstanding the fact that there are a great many things to be attended to on that committee growing out of the recent prohibition legislation. There are a great many letters and memorials and inquiries coming into that committee from day to day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think that should be precipitated at this time. The committee has never had a clerk.

Mr. SABATH. It has always had a clerk.

Mr. STAFFORD. At $6 per day?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; it has always had a clerk since the committee has been organized; it has one now, and has had one ever since.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not want a contest over this matter this morning, does he?

Mr. SABATH. No; I do not want a contest. If there is any question about it, I am willing that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK] should withdraw it. But if there is a committee that needs a clerk at this time it is that committee, because on an average of 40 or 50 letters and resolutions come in every day. They have to be answered and taken up and attended to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK] temporarily withdraws this resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the railroad bill, which we are about to take up, the bill (H. R. 9414) granting increased compensation to certain officials, employees, and laborers in the Post Office Department and Postal Service, and for other purposes may be taken up and put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the consideration of the present bill—that is, this railroad bill—House bill 9414 be made a special order, barring, of course, Calendar Wednesday and the first and third Mondays and conference reports and privileged matters generally. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman from Kentucky object?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; I am in favor of the gentleman's bill. I did not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] objected.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman says he did not object.

The SPEAKER. I know; the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] objected.

Mr. LANGLEY. I object to the action of my colleague being attributed to me. I am in favor of the gentleman's bill, particularly if it is the bill which gives relief to the fourth-class postmasters, the rural carriers, and the star-route carriers.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes; and, pending that motion, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]—I want to make a unanimous consent request that the gentleman from Wisconsin shall control one-half of the time for general debate on that side and that I control it on this side. That is only for the control of debate.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us find out what the debate is going to be. I reserve the right to object for the time being, to ascertain how long the time for general debate is going to be.

Mr. SIMS. I was discussing that matter with the gentleman from Wisconsin this morning, and he thought that it would be better for us to begin the debate without an agreement, and we could probably reach an agreement later on, but to proceed without an agreement except that I shall control one-half and the gentleman from Wisconsin one-half of the time.

Mr. COX. Is the debate to be confined to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I want to make that as a separate request. This should not be coupled with any other request.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that we ought to reach an agreement as to the amount of debate.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he couple with his request for an equal division of the time the request that the time be controlled by himself and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], and that the debate be confined to the bill.

Mr. SIMS. I will make that request if this one is granted.

Mr. GARNER. But suppose this should be granted and the other one not?

Mr. SIMS. I want both to be granted.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not want to obstruct the consideration of this matter, but I shall not consent, if ever, except in the most extraordinary circumstances, to the limiting of general debate to any subject. That is the only chance that the Members of the House of Representatives have to express their opinions on current matters.

The SPEAKER. Nobody has made that request.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know; but the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was just suggesting that it be made and I thought I had better show the unwisdom of making such a request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the railroad bill (H. R. 9685); and pending that he asks that he control one-half the time for general debate and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] the other half. Is there objection to this request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will make the further request that general debate be limited to the subject matter of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the general debate be limited to the subject matter of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say this only——

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] objects.

Mr. SIMS. Now my motion is in order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be waived.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be waived. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important bills that has ever been before the House of Representatives for its consideration and enactment since I have been a Member of the House, which is now within a few days of 21 years. It is so important that I feel that all debate upon this bill should be confined to the provisions of the bill. I do not mean that upon a point of order a mere question of judgment is to be challenged as to whether what a gentleman may be saying applies to a provision in the bill or not, but it will require all the time that we ought to use in general debate to discuss the bill and proposed amendments. And when it is so absolutely necessary that it shall be enacted into law as soon as possible, consistent with due and proper consideration, I hope that no gentleman will ask to make a speech or will want time yielded him to make a speech on a subject in no way related to this legislation. We have a number of appropriation bills to be considered yet by the House, and it has always been the custom that on appropriation bills liberal time is given for general debate, to the end that gentlemen of the House may discuss any subject in order under the rules when the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I would have no objection to debate on other subjects if it were not for the fact of the great urgency of this emergency legislation.

The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce remained in continuous session for five weeks, or about that time, not confining their sessions simply to the forenoons, but often continued in session until the time for adjournment of the House; and I feel that the members of this committee who have studied this subject so faithfully, who have attended the hearings so continuously, should have a reasonable opportunity to explain to the House, or to Members of the House who have not given the matter that amount of study and thought and attention that members of the committee have, the provisions of this bill, and that they should not be crowded out simply to grant accommodation requests to discuss subjects that do not relate to the bill.

I shall now ask that I be not interrupted for a few minutes. I want to read a synopsis in the way of an explanation of the bill, which is practically the majority report. But many Members, perhaps, have not read the report, or some of them at least have not read it, and I always find that it is better to have a synopsis of a speech in the first part of it if you want it to be read, because so many people will read just a few pages of a speech and not read all of it. That is my reason for pursuing this course. Therefore, while it is not my custom to read speeches or to prepare them in writing, I wish to read this synopsis, and just as soon as I have finished it, I shall then do what we sometimes call turning loose on the whole subject, but with as much brevity as possible in explaining the bill at length.

This measure is war emergency legislation, intended to meet the essential needs growing out of Federal control of our great carrier systems. It is not to be regarded as a bill for Government ownership or control of railroads or against Government ownership or control of railroads. The bill makes neither for nor against any particular kind of railroad regulation. It undertakes to provide for war needs only.

The bill is comparatively short and easily understood. It consequently requires but brief explanation.

The act of August 29, 1916, authorized the President in time of war to assume the possession, control, and use of transportation systems. It provided no method for determining the just compensation of the owners of properties thus applied to public use. The right to just compensation is a constitutional right; the determination of the amount of just compensation is a judicial and not a legislative question.

But Congress may and should provide speedy and easily available judicial machinery for determining this just compensation. It is also desirable that the owners of the properties should, instead of being required to resort to the courts for their rights, be made such offers for just compensation as will result in an agreement between them and the United States determinative of all rights. These, together with certain obviously needed supplementary powers as to financing during Federal control, are the main purposes of this bill.

Section 1 is a fundamentally important section, for it fixes the outside limits of the proposed agreements. Its sole function is to provide a basis of such just and proper agreements as may eliminate litigation. This section authorizes the President to make contracts with the operating carriers under which they shall receive in lieu of their constitutional rights the average of their railway operating income for the three years ended June 30, 1917.

Ordinary taxes, Federal and State, are to be paid as hitherto out of operating income. But war taxes are payable out of the standard return. The owners of railroad securities, like the owners of other securities, are thus left to carry their share of the war-tax burden.

The agreements authorized in section 1 are also to contain adequate and careful provisions as to depreciation and maintenance, and for all such adjustments of accounts between the Government and the carrier companies as may be necessary to effectuate the Government's obligation of paying a just compensation not exceeding the three-year average earnings, besides keeping up the properties, leaving the Government, however, if it turns the property back improved or increased at Government expense to be reimbursed therefor.

This standard provision will doubtless be found applicable to most railroad companies. Seventy-five great operating systems do more than 90 per cent of the business, but there are some new, undeveloped, reorganizing companies for which some special provision ought to be made. The bill accordingly authorizes the President to make such agreements as he may deem just with companies whose just compensation he finds will plainly not be measured by the three-year earnings basis.

Naturally there has been much discussion as to the justice of the proposed basis of settlement. Our committee has dealt with this as a practical question. It consequently regards much of the evidence adduced before the committee concerning "surplus" as irrelevant. This is not the time to undertake to settle public policy as to so-called "surplus earnings." The facts are that these companies having during this three-year period had certain earnings; that they are entitled as a constitutional right to have their just compensation adjudicated by the courts; that it is probably—almost certain—that any court would take their average earnings for some reasonable period as persuasive evidence of such just compensation.

Viewing their constitutional right in connection with the great public needs of stabilizing the security market—of restoring and not impairing confidence—our committee was of the opinion that the average earnings of three years is a fair basis for a settlement of the rights of most of these owners against their Government, and ought to be approved. Nineteen hundred and fifteen was one of the worst years in recent railroad history; the other two years were prosperous. The average of the three years is therefore a fair test of earning power. Moreover, the investment in the properties of railroads now taken over has been increasing at a rate above $100,000,000 a year. The properties the Government now has the use of are larger by about a third of a billion dollars than the properties that made the earnings of 1915, taken as one of the three years in order to reach the standard return.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I asked that I might be permitted to finish this brief statement.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman says about one-third of a billion, while the report says about one billion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has requested that he be not interrupted.

Mr. SIMS. I am going to discuss that later on, and in my remarks will give the reason why I say about one-third of a billion, or in excess of $100,000,000 a year.

Mr. KEARNS. Is the statement in the report correct?

Mr. SIMS. I do not want to stop to discuss it now, but I will come to that when I get through with this synopsis.

It is not pretended that the three-year basis is an accurate mathematical test of just compensation, but our committee believed it to be a basis essentially just, and one that will be plainly understood, easily workable, and generally approved both by the public and by the security holders.

Section 3 provides "due process of law" for nonagreeing carriers and also authorizes an agreement between the President and any company after report by the referees to be appointed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was the belief of our committee that few, if any, cases will ever reach the Court of Claims. This section requires no further explanation.

Section 4 provides for increasing compensation as the properties used increase during the period of Federal control.

Section 5 limits dividend disbursements to regular dividends except as the President may otherwise permit. Nondividend payers may, however, pay dividends as permitted. Manifestly any excess revenues accruing from standard return ought not to be made the basis of speculation or manipulation. Steady, regular income is what is desirable during the period of the war.

Section 6 provides for a revolving fund, to be made up of an appropriation of $500,000,000 from the Treasury and any excess revenue derived from the operation of the companies. This revolving fund may be used by the President to provide equipment, additions, and road extensions, and to make advances to the companies so far as necessary for these purposes. This section contemplates direct ownership by the United States of new railroad equipment and perhaps of terminals. It does not contemplate ownership of such road extensions, tracks, and so forth, as may be necessary in connection with Army camps, shipyards, and so forth. In the opinion of our committee the title to such additions and extensions should be in the various companies and not in the United States. But as some such extensions will be made for war purposes and cost more than their value during peace times, the right of the company to have a just portion of this compulsory investment paid by the Government is protected. This section also provides for the construction and utilization of transportation facilities on our waterways. The burden on our rail carriers may be much lightened if we make proper use of these great natural highways.

Section 7 provides for Government financing of maturing obligations and other necessary capital requirements of the companies during Federal control. Securities purchased may, if the President finds it desirable, be sold at not less than cost.

Sections 8 and 10 need no explanation.

Section 9 guards the rights of certain railroads which may not be taken over, not to have their traffic and routing arrangements unnecessarily injured.

Section 11 embodies the theory of the President's proclamation that there shall be no unnecessary disturbance of established methods of procedure by and against the carrier companies. While it is undoubtedly true that during the period of Federal control the revenues of the railroads are Government money, section 11—certainly when read in connection with section 8, which authorizes the President to execute his powers through such agencies as he may determine—permits the utilization of the various carrier companies, as a species of Government agencies, so that for all practical purposes passengers, shippers, and employees will proceed as hitherto in the exercise and enforcement of all their accustomed rights.

But when Federal control for war purposes requires changed methods the President must have power to make such changes. The rate fabric of the country is now based upon the competitive theory. In many instances rail rates have been made for the purposes of meeting, if not destroying, water competition. Section 6, as already pointed out, contemplates that the Federal Government shall from its own resources create new facilities upon the waterways. Manifestly during Federal control rail rates ought not to be made for the purpose of destroying or "meeting water competition." The Nation should not compete with itself It should furnish transportation service, both rail and water, at just and reasonable rates. On the other hand, it is manifestly impracticable and undesirable for the President or any agencies he may create to readjust our present rate fabric. Comparatively little of it ought to be readjusted, and such necessary adjustment should come tentatively and only to meet obvious needs. Our committee was of the opinion that section 11 meets the situation in the least objectionable and in the most practicable way. It provides that, except as the President may from time to time otherwise order, rates shall continue to be and to be determined as hitherto.

This leaves the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State commissions to proceed, precisely as hitherto, in the determination of all rate questions unless and until the President, in the exercise of the war power, shall order otherwise.

Mr. MADDEN. Will it interrupt the gentleman to answer a question there? I do not want to interrupt him unless he desires to be interrupted.

Mr. SIMS. I did want to finish this synopsis and then yield for interruptions.

Mr. MADDEN. There is just one place that I think might be a very appropriate place to ask my question, that is all.

Mr. SIMS. They are really all of them appropriate.

Mr. MADDEN. This one particularly.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask the gentleman to make a note of it in his mind.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to have it right where the statement of the gentleman is made.

Mr. SIMS. But when the public interest so requires the President may initiate rates, filing them with the Interstate Commerce Commission, to take effect upon such notice as he shall direct. Such rates are to be "fair, reasonable, and just." But to guard against even remote possibilities of error the section provides that upon complaint the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make investigation, grant full hearings "concerning the fairness, justice, and reasonableness" of rates so ordered by the President, and "make report of its findings and recommendations" to the President for such action as he shall deem required in the public interest.

It has been suggested that after such hearing the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given power to make orders, thus in effect overriding the President's war power to make rates on transportation systems in his possession and control because of war conditions. It would, in the opinion of our committee, be most unwise to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to overrule the President in the exercise of his war powers—indeed, of any other powers. It should not be overlooked that the President is responsible for the financial results of operating these great carrier systems with gross revenues approximating $4,000,000,000. It will not be contended that during Federal control the carrier systems should not be substantially self-supporting. The general taxpayer ought not to be left to make up a large deficit accruing from carrier operations. Wages and prices of materials are exceedingly high and may rise still higher. The volume of traffic, great during the past two years, may fall off. Weather conditions have for two months been unprecedently bad, making operation extraordinarily expensive. The President, responsible for the general financial result, from factors so numerous, so uncertain, and so varying, must be given power commensurate with his responsibility.

Moreover, if the Interstate Commerce Commission were given final power to make rates, what would be its standard of "reasonableness and justice"? Plainly the old, competitive standard, unless the present statute is repealed or greatly modified. To authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to overrule the President and to make such orders as to rates as are now permitted under the interstate-commerce act would be granting an authority to make rates, based on the competitive theory, applicable to a coordinated, unified, noncompetitive war control. In other words, the Interstate Commerce Commission could not, until so empowered by Congress, make orders logically applicable to the "justice and reasonableness of rates" made for a unified, coordinated system during war time.

We are satisfied that the method proposed of leaving rates and rate making undisturbed, except as the President otherwise orders; authorizing the President to initiate rates; providing for a review on full hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and the findings and recommendations of the Inter-State Commerce Commission to be reported to the President, so that he may, if necessary, revise his own prior determination, is the best solution of this difficult problem. In practice, this method will give to shippers and consignees all the protection they now have under the established practices of the Interstate Commerce Commission, while enabling the President to make such necessary changes as unified war control demands. It also gives the Interstate Commerce Commission an opportunity to review and to discuss fully the "justice, reasonableness, and fairness" of any rate in the light of the war conditions, without now putting upon Congress the impossible burden of providing new, noncompetitive rate-making legislation.

Section 12 provides for penalties to be enforced by the usual processes in the courts, and calls for no comment or explanation.

Section 13 provides for continuing the life and status quo of cases pending. It was inserted at the request of the Department of Justice.

Section 14 deals with the duration of Federal control. It authorizes the President at any time prior to July 1, 1918, to relinquish control of all or any part of any system of transportation which he thinks not necessary or desirable for national or war purposes, and at any time thereafter to make such relinquishment on agreement with the owners, thus in either case ending all further claim for compensation. But this power will in use be of little importance. The main question is when and how to end general Federal control.

While these transportation systems were taken over under the war power, it is easily manifest that they ought not to be turned back to their owners immediately upon the return of peace. They might have been taken, and they may be kept, under the commerce clause of the Constitution. Section 6 contemplates the investment of a large amount of Government money in rolling stock and, perhaps, in terminals, "to be disposed of as Congress may hereafter by law provide." Section 7 contemplates financing the carriers' maturities; these in the years 1918 and 1919 will amount to approximately $400,000,000.

Unified control will involve substantial changes in the traffic departments of the various carriers, new routing of much traffic, and many other changes from the methods obtaining under the competitive system. It would be just neither to the public nor to the owners of the properties to return the properties to private control without legislation adequately providing fair and reasonable terms for the liquidation of the Government's holdings of railroad securities, for the sale or other use of the Government's rolling stock, and for other changes incidental to the war control. It may be that the country will never be willing to have the carriers go back to the old system of uncoordinated, competitive operation. For many years many forms of new and enlarged regulation have been pending before Congress. That some program of constructive, far-reaching policy ought to be worked out before the railroad companies are returned to private control seems too clear for argument.

The majority of our committee, while accepting these views, are of the opinion that a definite period of two years should be set as the time limit within which such legislation should be matured and enacted. Obviously, the period may hereafter be extended if such extension be found necessary in the public interest. The majority were of the opinion that the insertion of a definite time limit for Federal control puts the burden of presenting proper measures of constructive legislation where it belongs—upon the owners of the properties—and that it is inconsistent with the public interest to allow a war control, admittedly assumed for emergency purposes only, to extend indefinitely in time of peace. A minority of our committee hold a different view. They believe that the public interest is much better safeguarded if the Federal control herein and heretofore provided for shall be continued until Congress shall after the war otherwise provide.

Now, the gentleman on my left, Mr. KEARNS, rose to ask me a question a while ago, but kindly refrained.

Mr. KEARNS. It says here in the report that the investment in the property of the railroads so turned over has been increasing at the rate of about $375,000,000 per year.

Mr. SIMS. That is the statement in the report.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman in his statement says about one-third of that amount.

Mr. SIMS. I will say not less. Now I will tell the gentleman why in my remarks I did not follow that part of the report. Since then I have made inquiries as best I could, but from the information I received, which was not altogether satisfactory, I was afraid that the estimate put in the report was too large. I felt from information that I received that it certainly did amount to one hundred millions or more, and in three years it would amount to one-third of a billion dollars or more.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. In the course of the gentleman's very able address in connection with this legislation, I think I understood him to say that he was in favor of permitting the President of the United States to originate rates and on complaint to have hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission, that they might ascertain the facts and submit them as prima facie evidence to the President of the United States, and he would still retain the power to fix the rates.

Mr. SIMS. What I said and what is in the bill, as I understand it, is that rate making will go on just as it did before the railroads were taken over both by the Interstate Commerce Commission and State commissions.

Mr. MADDEN. The bill does not provide that, does it?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; the bill reads on page 12, line 12:

> Until and except so far as the President shall from time to time otherwise order, the rates, fares, charges, classification, regulations, and practices of carriers under Federal control shall during the period of Federal control continue to be and to be determined as hitherto. But when—

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but that language could not by any stretch of imagination be construed to mean that the rates be originated as they are to-day and passed upon by the commission as they are to-day.

Mr. SIMS. I said the power given the President to originate rates is exceptional and not the rule, and that the rate-making power will remain just where it is now, both by the State and the Federal commissions, until the President should otherwise order.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should the President of the United States be given the authority to make a rate without respect to what the Interstate Commerce Commission may say about it?

Mr. SIMS. I will be glad to answer the gentleman. This is a very important matter, and the gentleman may take his seat, because it may take me some time to answer satisfactorily. Now, that question can be answered in part by asking another, Why should the railroads be turned over to the President at all?

Mr. MADDEN. I will answer that question.

Mr. SIMS. I did not ask it for the purpose of being answered, but let the gentleman answer it.

Mr. MADDEN. The reason why they are turned over to him at all is that Congress in its wisdom thought some time last summer that it might be wise during the period of the war, as a war measure, to give the President the right to operate the railroads; but answering further, if the Congress had exercised its wisdom in another direction it might have authorized the discontinuance of the operation of the Sherman law and given the railroad companies through their experienced managers the same power to coordinate the railroads into one system that they give the President, and they would have reached better results.

Mr. SIMS. In the first place, the gentleman is mistaken when he says last summer. In 1916, August 29, the Congress, in an amendment to the military appropriation bill, made provision for the President to take over the railroad systems. That was before we were in any war at all. That was when the only cloud on our horizon was the gentleman in Mexico——

A MEMBER. Our war with Mexico.

Mr. SIMS. We had no war with Mexico; we were there to assist the authorities in Mexico to apprehend and capture the Mexican bandit, Villa, that had crossed into American territory and committed murder within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. It was not a very successful expedition.

Mr. SIMS. This is not the time for levity, and I do not mean to inject anything of the kind into the debate. I want to call to the attention of the gentleman that in making that provision it contemplated only the use of such a system of railroads as might in our opinion be necessary to put under Federal control so far as the conflict with Mexico or the Mexicans, or in the aid of Mexico, was then necessary. Of course, it was not necessary in a small undertaking, in a small disturbance, to turn over all the railway systems and to make all the provisions that may be necessary when we are in actual war with the greatest military power in the world.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman that I am in close accord with the closest unification of these railroads as one system for the purpose of aiding the war activities in the best and the most expeditious way, but that does not imply that I am in favor of the President of the United States making commercial railroad rates.

Mr. SIMS. I hope I will be able to bring the gentleman around to that view of it.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman will.

Mr. SIMS. Do not let us have any prejudged immovable barriers as to what is best for the country. What is the Interstate Commerce Commission? It is a body created by Congress for the purpose of enforcing regulation of railroads. In what capacity were the railroads to be regulated? The railroads were private corporations, private enterprises, doing a public business and had been guilty, or so alleged, of granting rebates and discriminations between the shippers and communities, and of being guilty of unfair practices, and a thousand and one things not necessary to enumerate. The commission was created for the purpose of regulating privately owned competitive railroad companies, to prevent these companies from abusing their powers, and to make them act according to the rule of right and justice and not to destroy any community by giving another a favored rate, not to build up and make millionaires out of some shippers by giving them rebates and other advantages of transportation.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman from Illinois let me finish? He asked me a question that demands a long explanation, and I can not say what I want to say in another man's language, but I must say it in my own way. Legislation was had with reference to the operation of competing railway systems serving the public as to reasonableness of rates, the fairness and justice of these rates. We know that from the time that the Interstate Commerce Commission was created as a rule the railway companies fought every effort that was made by the commission to execute its powers in the public interest, and fought all laws that were enacted by the Congress for their proper regulation, and many of them were held by the courts to not be what Congress clearly intended they should be, until finally Mr. Roosevelt was elected President of the United States by the largest popular majority, as I now remember, of any candidate theretofore elected, and was elected upon a platform that did not require him to advocate any enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It was a day when we had universal corporate prosperity, and almost all other sorts, measured by money. The railroads were happy, and all other corporations were happy, and the Republican Party, having been returned to power with the greatest popular majority it ever had and one of the largest in the House of Representatives, was happy. Your unruly President, however, would not be happy, but demanded justice to the shipping public. It was absolutely impossible for the managers of corporate properties to understand it, or to conceive why on earth he was not "practical" in that as well as in some other matters. He advocated in a message to Congress, without any pledge in his platform, without any election pledge of his own, that the Congress enact legislation strengthening the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission so as to make it worth its salt, and you know and I know—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was here—what a tremendous fight the corporate owners and the owners of corporate securities made against any effective legislation along that line. The gentleman knows that if it had not been for the prestige of the man who had just been elected President of the United States and for his bulldog determination to have the legislation he advocated that bill would not have passed the Congress that did pass in 1906 increasing the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. And whatever you may say about the ex-President of the United States and all of the useful things that he has done and some things that he has done that are not so useful, I want to say that that one act of his in bringing the party that had been absolutely dominated, as far as that election was concerned, by corporate interests to the enactment of that legislation is something that ought to, and will, make him live in history through the ages—showing that we can trust a man to do a great deal, to accomplish a great result, when he has justice and right on his side, regardless of the opposition of the millionaires and all of the politicians who had fattened on corporate contributions to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Has the gentleman finished answering the question of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SIMS. No; I have not. Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to another thing. That law had hardly been placed on the statute books and had been interpreted before a proposition was brought in here to create a special court to have exclusive jurisdiction of all suits brought to test the validity of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and some very, very good men, both in Congress and out, believed in it.

The cry was that these suits were so many and so vast and so important that they could not be heard and determined in a reasonable time without a special court to do nothing else. The Congress, as I believe, over the opinions of a majority of the House, permitted that to go into the legislation of that day, and we commenced then immediately to have that court abolished. Before it was abolished it had decided a number of cases that had been brought to enjoin the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and on those cases being passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal, about 80 per cent were reversed. Then Congress, in its wisdom, abolished it. The court never should have been established in the first place. It was a way to get around, to circumvent, and destroy the effective powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission—having a special court that was open to nobody except those who were attacking the orders of the commission.

You see how difficult it has been to secure legislation making this commission worth its salt in time of peace, but it is all based on the theory that you have got private greed to contend with, that you have competitive conditions to contend with, and there is not a syllable of law that now exists that provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall initiate one single rate. The commission can not initiate rates. It is absolutely without power to do so. All it can do is to suspend the rates when filed by a carrier or by carriers, either upon its own motion or upon complaint, and then after having full hearing determine a maximum rate, not over and above which would be reasonable. Therefore, its function is not initiative, but is in the nature of veto. We are now in war. We are parties to this war. It may become absolutely necessary at any time to transport bodies of troops and munitions without any compensation to the carrying railroad. It may be absolutely necessary, though we hope few such cases will ever arise, in which a rate, to be worth anything, must be initiated immediately. This bill with great caution provides that the President may initiate a rate when he in the public interest deems that it is necessary.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. In a moment. Then upon complaint it is referred to the commission which investigates and reports to the President as to the justice, reasonableness, and fairness of the rate, and then he may still maintain that rate, but you know, and I know, there never has been a President of the United States under such circumstances, especially if the rate affected commercial products in ordinary commercial transit of the country, who would not do exactly what the Interstate Commerce Commission advises in such a case.

Mr. GORDON. Then, what is the use of conferring the power if he will not exercise it?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has asked a question. I did not say that he would not exercise it. I said upon reference to the commission and the commission found there was any injustice in it, any discrimination, anything unreasonable, and it affected the ordinary business of the country, there is not a President the country has ever had who would not make the rate in accordance with the recommendation of the commission.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. SIMS. I promised sometime back to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. The function of making rates is a legislative function?

Mr. SIMS. Quasi.

Mr. GORDON. Quasi? No; it is a legislative function. Is that true or not?

Mr. SIMS. Go ahead and ask the question.

Mr. GORDON. That is the question I want the gentleman to answer. Is it a legislative function or not?

Mr. SIMS. I said quasi, in the nature of a legislative function.

Mr. GORDON. That is the gentleman's judgment about it?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. What is there about the country being in war that makes the President of the United States competent to exercise a legislative function. The gentleman has just said we are in war, and that the President would not exercise this power, anyway; that if the Interstate Commerce Commission found the President was wrong—the President has not very much to do, of course, in time of war except to fix rates—now, the gentleman says if the Interstate Commerce Commission after investigation—and it can not fix rates until it does investigate—finds that the actions of the President were erroneous that the President will reverse himself. Now, if that is so, why not leave the power where the law puts it now?

Mr. SIMS. Now, I will answer the gentleman when he gets through——

Mr. GORDON. Answer that.

Mr. SIMS. All right. Now, the gentleman says, leave it where it is.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; where the law puts it.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman know where it is?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Where is it?

Mr. GORDON. Under the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is where this body put it.

Mr. SIMS. No, sir.

Mr. GORDON. Where is it, then?

Mr. SIMS. The railroads initiate their own rates.

Mr. GORDON. It does not fix them, though.

Mr. SIMS. A railroad initiates the rates, and after a certain date they go into effect unless suspended by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, there is a whole lot of difference in recommending it, where it is up to the railroads to initiate rates and to depend upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to vacate them or set them aside or reduce them in time of war, and letting the President initiate a rate which goes into effect immediately as a war necessity.

Mr. GORDON. Well, but the gentleman does not allow the President to initiate. I will favor giving the President power to initiate rates, but I would not want to give him power to fix them absolutely. The gentleman converts the Interstate Commerce Commission into a debating society.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. SIMS. Just make it as short as the gentleman can.

Mr. MADDEN. It will be short. Under the present law the railroad companies have the power to initiate a rate, but they can not file a rate unless the Interstate Commerce Commission decides that they have a right to file it, and after they do file it the Interstate Commerce Commission can suspend it and then finally pass upon it.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. In just a moment; I can not answer now.

Mr. BURNETT. And I would suggest to the gentleman that he be brief, too, in answering.

Mr. SIMS. I will try to, but the gentleman knows what a long-range question the gentleman has asked.

Mr. OLNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I am trying to answer the gentleman from Illinois. I would state briefly I have been interrupted so that I have forgotten exactly what the question was. Will the gentleman state it briefly?

Mr. MADDEN. The question I put was rather in the form of a statement; that under the present law that the railroad companies have the power to initiate the rates, but they have no power to file a rate unless the Interstate Commerce Commission permitted them to do it. Then after they do file the rate the Interstate Commerce Commission still has the power to suspend the rate for a given period.

Mr. SIMS. That is true.

Mr. MADDEN. And when the rate is finally made the Interstate Commerce Commission makes it.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; that is true, and as I said a while ago the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission is to act on rates made by privately owned, privately operated competitive companies in time of peace to prevent injustices between the several shippers and communities, but in no sense to exercise a power——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is not going to give that power in this bill?

Mr. SIMS. When this war commenced we did require by an amendment to the bill increasing the commission that before a railroad could file a rate that it should be approved. Why did we do it? The commission was up to its ears in very important business. The commission was up to their eyes in very important business, and under the rules and the law when the railroad filed its rate, it would go into effect in 30 days and become a rate subject, of course, afterwards to suspension by the commission on complaint, and in order that the commission might have absolute control we amended the law, and have limited the time so as to cover the war period; so, in order to file a rate and have it go into effect, we require it to be approved by the commission before filing.

Mr. BURNETT. As I understand from your bill, you give this power to the President? That is, he may exercise it in regard to rates on railroads that are entirely inside of the border of a State, where the freight is entirely intrastate freight. Would not that absolutely, by this kind of legislation, destroy the power of the State railway commissions to fix intrastate rates on intrastate railroads, and so forth?

Mr. SIMS. My understanding is that it absolutely would not.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the way I understood the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. The railroads are taken over as a war measure. We have hardly any intrastate railroads that are not connected with lines outside of the State.

Mr. OLNEY. Many of us who voted for the Adamson bill hoped that legislation would follow so as to meet this eight-hour bill with wage increase—that is, a bill to increase the freight rates and passenger rates of the railroads—but that legislation did not follow, for which most of us were sorry. Under this bill the Government proposes to give the railroads an increase of freight and passenger rates, does it not, which it refused to do under private conditions?

Mr. SIMS. The bill does not propose anything. It only gives the President power as an exceptional matter and in the public interest to initiate rates. The rates that he so determines are to be in the public interest.

Mr. OLNEY. Let me give an illustrative case. The Norfolk & Western Railroad in shipping wheat to Baltimore in 1910 maintained about the same freight rate as it does at the present time, and the carriers of wheat in Virginia last year, receiving $2.40 and $3 a bushel for their wheat, paid about the same rate as they did in 1910. Now, it would be possible under Federal control, which was refused under private ownership, to increase the freight rates?

Mr. GORDON. And tax the farmer on the wheat because he was getting a higher price for it?

Mr. OLNEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Yes. And that is the reason I am opposed to it.

Mr. SIMS. Let me answer the question. We legislate with reference to probabilities and probable necessities, and not with reference to possibilities and possible necessities. I do not see any necessary relation between the increase of war prices on wheat or corn or pork and the freight charge for their carriage. The only way that I can see where it burdens the carrier more than it did before is that, if the carrier is made responsible for the loss of wheat, pork, or corn, it would have to pay more in the nature of insurance. But the law says a reasonable rate, and a reasonable rate is one that gives a fair return upon the money actually invested and used in performing the service.

Mr. OLNEY. In your investigation you found, probably that some of the small railroads at least were on the verge of bankruptcy and welcomed Federal control but probably not Federal ownership?

Mr. GORDON. The New Haven, for instance.

Mr. OLNEY. But when the railroads are put on their feet by the Government, for instance, after the war is over they will go back to their original ownership and not necessarily welcome Government ownership.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT The gentleman has referred several times, and it is also found in his report, to the powers of the President to make rates as war powers of the President. I would like to know upon what theory the gentleman contends that the power to make rates is a war power of the President?

Mr. SIMS. I do not mean rates in general.

Mr. LENROOT. Any rates.

Mr. SIMS. I think he has got the power to order a railroad company to carry soldiers and sailors anywhere without any compensation.

Mr. LENROOT. I am asking on what the gentleman's theory is based that the making of rates is a war power at all.

Mr. SIMS. I do not care whether it is a war power or not, just so he has the power to do that which may be absolutely necessary in the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Can the gentleman think of any possible situation, whether we have one rate or another, where it would have the slightest influence on the President carrying on the prosecution of the war, when the Government, under the gentleman's bill, must pay the bill, either by revenues or some other way?

Mr. SIMS. Well, that is an argument.

Mr. GORDON. It was a pretty hard one, too.

Mr. RUSSELL. I want to ask a question or two about another branch of this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining of the first hour.

Mr. RUSSELL. As I understand this bill and the proposition embraced in it, the Government takes charge of only a part of the railroads of the country. It does not include in the order of control a lot of short lines in the United States, does it?

Mr. SIMS. It includes all of them.

Mr. RUSSELL. It includes all the railroads?

Mr. SIMS. I will explain that to you. It is in the bill. The bill as now reported, which was, of course, amended from what it originally was, provides in cases where it would be plainly inequitable to apply a standard return that the President may make a settlement with roads taken over without any reference to standard returns. Section 9 provides that where a short line or any road is not taken over there shall not be such a change and rerouting of freight as will injure it, but if they find it necessary to reroute freight, then the President is authorized to require the road to which it was rerouted to make up that loss by routing an equal amount of freight to this line that was not taken over.

Mr. RUSSELL. Section 9, as the gentleman states, assumes that some roads have not been taken over, as it speaks about the remedy in case of those that are not so taken.

As I understand the provisions of this bill, some roads have not yet been taken over, but may be hereafter.

Mr. SIMS. That is possible

Mr. RUSSELL. Does not the gentleman believe that if the policy of the Government and of the President under this bill is to take over certain roads to the exclusion of other smaller roads, that fact of itself will depreciate the value of the stocks and bonds of the short lines not taken over and will tend to drive them into the hands of receivers?

Mr. SIMS. Not under the bill that is now prepared and reported.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the gentleman think this bill will sufficiently safeguard the rights and interests of those roads that are not taken over?

Mr. SIMS. Section 9 was drawn in consultation with those very gentlemen.

Mr. RUSSELL. Were the representatives of the short lines of the country satisfied with this provision?

Mr. SIMS. They drew the provision in this form.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. If my time permits I will.

Mr. WALSH. Did the gentleman intend, in answering a question of my colleague [Mr. OLNEY], that because the farmers received more for their wheat in the last year or so, therefore the freight rates on wheat should be increased?

Mr. SIMS. No; I did not say they should be increased.

Mr. WALSH. I could not understand what was taking place.

Mr. SIMS. There was no relationship in that at all with the increase per se. It is provided that the roads shall receive reasonable compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, although my time has expired, I did not complete all I wished to say, but I could not answer questions and at the same time explain the bill as fully as I would like. But I felt I could not decline to answer questions under the circumstances.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Would the gentleman like to have his time extended?

Mr. SIMS. No; I thank the gentleman. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] will follow me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. SIMS. I thank the gentleman, but the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself are trying to arrange the distribution of the time equitably.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is chairman of the committee, and very many Members would like to interrogate him concerning certain paragraphs in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. The only trouble is that all the time I take over the hour will be taken out of somebody else's time who would want to use it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman is chairman of the committee.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for one hour.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, while I have prepared a considerable amount of notes upon this general subject, yet it seems to me that perhaps I can make it plainer by saying less.

PROVIDE FOR ADJUSTMENT OF COMPENSATION.

The matter before the House is this: There is no doubt about the necessity and power of the President to control the carriers of this country. There is no doubt that if we pass no law the carriers would be paid reasonable compensation through the courts. There is no doubt, however, that unless we provide some agreement as to such compensation, as we do by this bill, the courts would be swamped, the delay in paying that compensation would upset and destroy every railroad security throughout the country, and with it our financial markets and our Government credit in selling upon those financial markets, and that this bill allowing an agreement as to compensation is a necessity.

We might go further. I think we would have the right to fix the compensation in war times, at least provisionally. We have not done it by this bill. We leave it to agreement or the courts. The majority and the minority have agreed about the principle of that agreement for compensation, that the railroads and carriers shall not be paid for extra profits that would be made by war business, but shall be paid on a standardized statement of what they actually made before the war began. In this we follow the example of England.

REPAIR AND NEW EQUIPMENT.

We have likewise agreed that the Federal Government should keep the property in as good repair as it received it. That is just. We have likewise provided, inasmuch as our railroads have in a measure fallen down and are out of equipment and somewhat out of repair owing to causes that we need not go into, that the Government may buy new equipment and furnish that repair.

The committee has made a material amendment. The bill as presented by the Government provided that all new cars and rolling stock shall belong to the Government, so that at the end of the war they would have on hand any amount of rolling stock that they would not know what to do with. We have provided that they may do that, or that they may assign the equipment to the various companies and arrange that their securities be issued and the interest taken care of, so that that matter may be adjusted as the war goes on, which we think is much better. In this respect the House bill differs from the Senate bill, and the House ought to insist on the House provision.

BETTERMENT ACCOUNTS.

We also tried to give general powers to adjust the difficult question as to renewals and betterment account. If before the war any railroad did not make proper renewals and repairs, or charged what were really repairs and renewals, and not improvements, to capital account, they thereby increased on paper their return of net operating income, and the Government would seem to be paying them too much. What is more, in taking over a railroad of that sort which had run down, the Government would have to do extraordinary repairs at its own cost to put the road in order. There is a provision by which that can be somewhat adjusted. I myself think that little adjustment will be necessary, because, instead of taking the income of the last year before the war, which was large and which, I think, the companies were fairly entitled to, we have taken the average of three years before the war, including one year which was very small, and the difference between the average income and the income of 1917 will take care, I think, of all extraordinary questions of repair.

I think also it must be taken into consideration that we do not pay for the enormous war business which the Government will do upon these roads, and that we could fairly cut the Gordian knot by assuming those repairs on Government account.

TIME LIMIT WHEN WAR ENDS.

One question was strongly debated. This is a war power, and control should, in principle, end with the war. The committee have agreed that a reasonable time after the war shall be limited in which the railroads shall be given back. The minority think that the 2 years which they have allowed, and even the 18 months allowed by the Senate, is too long; that 1 year is enough.

RATE CONTROL OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

There was one other question of difference in the committee: The majority have agreed that rates during the war shall be finally in control of the President of the United States. The minority are of opinion that such control, which is a legislative matter, can not be given to the Executive, but must remain in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as heretofore, and we think that all the more because the power to raise rates would give to an Executive the power of taxation, which can not belong to any Executive.

PRESIDENT MAY SURRENDER.

There is another matter in which I perhaps am giving only my own opinion and not that of the minority: The President, when he took control, said he reserved the power to surrender control at any time. The bill takes that power from him and only allows him to surrender control before July next, except by agreement with the carriers, which he might not be able to make, and he is bound therefore to hold those roads until the expiration of the time limit when the necessity may have passed.

The Senate, while providing that single roads can only be surrendered by consent under certain conditions, has added the provision that all roads may be surrendered by the President at any time if he thinks the necessity for holding them has passed. I think that is right and should be inserted in our bill.

STATE TAXATION SHOULD BE STANDARDIZED.

There is one other matter which I consider of more importance than is thought by other people. That is the subject of State taxation. We allow to the companies as revenue the net operating income which they received before the war, and they do not get any more because of increased Government operation during the war. I think the same principle ought to apply to taxes by States, counties, and municipalities, and that they should not tax Government war operations. Twenty States put a tax upon gross receipts, which would include the receipts of such operations. Therefore at the proper time I shall propose an amendment by which the Government of the United States, in control of the roads, shall pay to every State, county, municipality, or taxing board, whatever it may be, the same amounts of money each year that the property now or hereafter acquired was assessed for in 1917.

This, Mr. Chairman, is merely a statement of the issues of the bill thus far, which I hope to be able to enlarge upon. For fear I would not get through so complicated a matter I thought it best to make the statement as clearly as I could at the beginning.

How many minutes have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would rather go on with my description.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman would prefer not to be interrupted——

CARRIERS ARE CONTROLLED—THE SYSTEM, NOT MERELY PROPERTY.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I prefer for the present not to be interrupted. When I reach the topic that the gentleman wishes to speak about I shall be glad to be interrupted. I have said that the power to take these roads is beyond question. We acknowledged rather than gave that power by the act of 1916, which provided that in time of war the President might utilize all systems of transportation. It is a universal war power. If a general wants to move his forces within the war zone he takes from any farmer his wagons, teams, and teamsters, and carries with those horses and wagons and teamsters whatever he desires to transport, and pays the farmer for their use. That is what we are doing now. In time of war the sea has always been subject to military control, and every nation at war has tried to get the full control of the sea. Now, land transportation has grown, by the system of railroads, into a system of incorporated carriers that have 1,700,000 employees, and capital estimated at over $17,000,000,000. In the last year they made $1,000,000,000 of profit and collected $3,500,000,000 of revenue during the year, three times what the United States does in peace times. We control these carriers. I point out this, however: We did not take rails and buildings and cars. We took the systems, something that will go, the organization. We do not make 1,700,000 men Federal employees, subject to political appointment or civil service or Government insurance or compensation. We do nothing of the sort. We utilize these systems in the service of the Government. We are controlling, and the systems taken over are called in this bill very properly the "carriers." I mention that because so many people think we have taken all these men as our civil servants, and that we have taken the railroad property to become property of the United States.

TAKE AND PAY FOR WAR USE ONLY.

We might have to do that. We do not do it now. We utilize the systems. As I have said, control was necessary, that the war power must be exercised in this way; but when I have said that, I say likewise that the taking is an emergency war taking and nothing else. Constitutionally the President could only take, under the interstate-commerce power, interstate roads. He took all, even those running from a town down to a shipyard in a State. He may take every trolley road. He has taken everything that will do the work of the war, and he does that also because we could not afford to take under the commerce power. That would be a permanent taking, and we would have to pay the whole value of the roads, and we can not raise at least $17,000,000,000 in addition to our war debt in order to pay every stockholder and bondholder of these roads what they are worth. It is therefore an emergency taking, and only the taking of the use—the use during the war. Let us not forget that. It was proposed by the original bill, and there may be an effort made to put it back, that we should take until Congress otherwise orders. That means that under the present law we would hold them forever, and under such a taking we would have to pay for them. Under the war power we take all roads, not forever, but the use of them for the period of the war and for a reasonable time thereafter. The House, I know, will stand by that. If the United States took them until Congress otherwise provides you might as well call it Government ownership. What is more, it would be dangerous to take with the idea that a law giving the railroads back could be passed promptly. It is hard to pass a law through Congress, with the vote of its two bodies, and with the assent of the President. Delays are possible by single men. In one body of this Congress one man can stop almost any legislation. If we took the carriers in that way, subject to return only by act of Congress, that act would be likely to be delayed by one of the two parties. If the Government found it pleasant to run all the roads and to take care of 1,700,000 employees, the Government might block the act. If the carriers found it pleasant to get dividends without doing any work, the carriers might block the act.

TIME LIMIT INSURES RETURN.

The only way to be sure to have the roads returned within a reasonable time after the war and to have the necessary legislation is to fix a time. I think that the time should be short. If we fixed it at six months, there would probably be a year or two occupied in the details of arranging the treaty of peace, and, added to that and during even six months if necessity arose, it would be quite possible to extend the time by act of Congress; while, on the other hand, if the matter has to be provided for then, it will be provided for, and it never will be so provided if the time is left in uncertainty and not limited.

AND AVOIDS FINANCIAL UNCERTAINTY.

It is objected that at the end of the war a time limit would cause trouble about finance and uncertainty in the stock markets. There would be still greater danger of uncertainty in the stock markets if the uncertainty remained as to whether the roads would ever be given back and uncertainty as to the terms on which they should be given back. The quicker the better. [Applause.]

POWER OF SURRENDER.

The President should have the power of surrender. If this war ended promptly, but there was much delay in settling the terms of peace, the President would want to hand back the roads. He should have the power to hand them all back.

He reserved that power in his proclamation, "and, by subsequent order and proclamation, control and operation in whole or in part may also be relinquished to the owners thereof of any part of the railroad systems and rail and water systems, possession and control of which are hereby assumed." It is reserved in the Senate bill containing the further proviso "that the President may relinquish all carriers under Federal control at any time that he shall deem such action needful or desirable." (S. 3752, p. 14, lines 13 to 15.) He should have this power for the protection of the Government, which should not be forced to keep the carriers when the war necessity is past, and for the protection of the carriers who are entitled to return of their property when the war needs are over. By the Senate bill the President may not surrender single roads after July 1 next except by agreement, but he may decide when the need of war control is over and surrender all roads.

To limit his power to give up the Federal control of all carriers is not only improper but it is unconstitutional if it limits the war power of the President.

VALUE OF USE AT TIME OF TAKING.

Most of these questions would come up without any new legislation. Federal control would be for the war and for a reasonable time thereafter, and the United States must pay the value of the use, but it is a good deal of a question on what principle that value should be agreed on or settled. The use taken is temporary. The principle in all takings of a temporary use is to pay the value of the use at the time of the taking. This can be obtained from the previous experience, the net operating revenues of the carrier. The bill provides that the carriers shall each be paid the average annual railway operating income for a period of three fiscal years ending June, 1917. This includes on the one hand nearly three months after war was declared—from April 6 up to June 30—but these three months may be disregarded, as little war business was done by the Government during the three months, because the United States was not ready to begin.

AVERAGE OF 3 YEARS IS FAIR.

These three fiscal years, however, ending June 30, 1915, 1916, and 1917, were three years of war in Europe. The first year, 1915, was a year of depression, because all of our financial markets were upset and we had not begun exporting business to Europe. The carriers made almost no money. In 1916 the exports of war munitions and materials began and continued, and it was a prosperous year; 1917 was almost more so. We recognize that the carriers have the right to the business which they did because of war needs elsewhere. We do not think they have a right to profit from the extra business that they do for United States war needs here. But during the war elsewhere they have a right to the average business that they would do by reason of the war elsewhere. If the central powers could blockade Europe, it might reduce our railroad business to a minimum, but as they did not our growing exports increased the carriers' business, and so it may be fair on the whole to take the average of the three years.

England had no such trouble. She took a peace year before the war.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will yield on that point.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is a distinguished lawyer; he has been chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House, and I want to ask him his judgment as to what the railroads would recover for the use of their property in case we made no provision by law?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not know; I think that the rule as to the taking is to ascertain the value by the conditions at the time of the taking. I think, for instance, if I took a lease out of your hands by legal force, you would be entitled to a continuance of your profits during that time, but not the profits that I might make by putting in another business. I think the railroads are entitled to a continuance of their profits before the war, but not entitled to the benefit of new business done by the United States during the war.

Mr. BORLAND. One question more. Is it not the recognized rule of law that before the person can recover for profits he must show that the profits spring out of the existing contract, which he is bound to prove? He can not recover for speculative profits.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We have tried to make an agreement based on the standard income of the railroads before the war.

AND WILL BE ACCEPTED.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman one more question. You have fixed in the bill a compensation for the period of three years. Then you go on in another case and say that the President may make other arrangements with smaller roads. Now, that means that the big roads can take the money if there is a profit, and if there is not a profit why can not they go into the court and insist on the legal rate?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. They certainly can; but the reason they do not want to do so is because they do not want to knock the prices of their stocks and bonds by leaving the matter uncertain when they know that they can settle it right away.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but suppose the money we offer them under this bill turns out to be less than they think the value of their property is?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. They can go into court if they want to, but they take the risk of not being able to pay their dividends during the period of litigation, and on the whole we think an agreement is going to be made.

Mr. BORLAND. It is only a moral question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is only a moral question. We think an agreement is going to be made.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would like to go on on that point for a moment. In addition to the principle about taking a short use in a lease, that the United States represents the whole people, who have the right to the free use of the carriers for necessary war business, paying only the damages that the system suffers by interference with its ordinary business. I believe that to be good law. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

PAR OF STOCKS NO MEASURE OF VALUE.

Mr. TOWNER. The amount that will be received under the terms of the bill by some of the railroads, as the gentleman well knows, will be very large.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Can not the gentleman reserve that until it is reached?

Mr. TOWNER. That is directly with regard to this proposition.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Ask your question, then.

Mr. TOWNER. I will if the gentleman will give me the time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will, with great pleasure, but the trouble is to get the time.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Go ahead; I am glad to have the gentleman ask the question.

Mr. TOWNER. The Lackawanna Road will receive 32.91 per cent; the Cincinnati & Texas Railroad will receive 44 per cent; the Burlington Road will receive 22 per cent; the Chicago & Erie Railroad will receive 70 per cent; the Duluth & Mesaba Road will receive 114 per cent; the Colorado & Wyoming——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Oh, you need not have your whole list. What is the question?

Mr. TOWNER. Just wait until I ask the question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I really can not wait for a whole list of railroads. I will answer the question before you put it; and that is, that the market value of those roads is not par. Those dividends are reckoned on par. They have long had standardized dividends, which have standardized the value of the stocks in the market, which are represented by the investment in the roadbed and the road property, and which we can not disturb now in time of war. Ten per cent paid on the United Railroads of New Jersey, under a lease, is paid really on a stock-market price in time of peace of 230, and it is less than 5 per cent.

Mr. TOWNER. I think perhaps I knew that as well as the gentleman, but this is the proposition. I was trying to show that a great many of these railroads were receiving very large and excessive profits, perhaps, and there are a great many railroads that will not receive anything. Does the gentleman think that the Government will be compelled to pay them upon anything like such a rate as these roads are receiving or what will be the profit?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will answer that question, and I will ask not to have another question right here. I will answer that question by saying that those are not the profits on the value of the roads but the profits on the par value of the stock, and in the case of the Lackawanna I think it goes to about 300. It is away up above par. I have no doubt that it is so with all these other roads. As to the roads that are making no profit by reason of the fact that they are in receivership or not completed, power is given to make special contracts, which will take care of them. All those details will come up when we get to the reading of the bill. It is the best that we can do to take things as they are. If you take things as they ought to be, you would never get through the courts.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman thinks that we are criticizing. We are not criticizing; we are just trying to receive information from the gentleman. The members of the committee are supposed at least to know something about these things. It is not for the purpose of criticizing that these inquiries are made. The gentleman seems to be very much irritated.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am not irritated at all; I am only trying to save my time. I have a great deal of information to give to the House that I really do know about, and I do not know about this.

POSSIBLE MODES OF VALUATION.

There are several methods by which the value of the use taken could be ascertained. The first is to throw the whole question of what is reasonable compensation into the courts; a second is to pay a fair interest on the cost; a third is to pay for business actually done; a fourth is to pay, as in this bill, a standardized rental based on prior incomes; and a fifth is, as is done in England in respect to controlled trades, to add to this standardized rental some part of the profits which are obtained from war business so as to make the owners of every business alive in its management so as to achieve efficiency and the making of profit. It is interesting to consider the precedents under these various plans.

1. CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS.

The first course is to throw the whole compensation into a commission or into the courts. In the Civil War the United States did actually under the act of January, 1862, take possession of roads where the public safety required it, which included only roads and telegraphs running into the Confederate States, and as to those roads and telegraphs it provided that the damage and reasonable compensation should be ascertained by a commission. I have not followed out how that was done. Roads and telegraphs taken were already ruined by their being cut off by the war zone or boundary, so that they would not receive a very large damage anyway by being taken by the Government. It was easily arranged, and there were only about 2,000 miles of them in all, so that it is not a precedent; but it can be said that if we were to throw all of the railroads of this country into a commission or court to determine the question we would swamp the commission or the courts and we would never get through.

2. INTEREST AS A VALUATION.

Now, the second one has been proposed by gentlemen who make the same objection made by the gentleman from Iowa

[Mr. TOWNER]. Will the gentleman give me his attention for a moment. The second proposition was to pay some rate—not more than 4 or 5 or a reasonable per cent—on the value of the carriers' property. The trouble with that plan is that no one could ever find out what the real cost or value of the roads was. The stocks and bonds in some cases were far below the amount invested in the roads, and in some cases they were far above the cost. The Interstate Commerce Commission has worked five years trying to get a valuation of the railroads and have not made a single valuation, although they have figures on two or three roads on which valuations can be made. Who will say what rate of interest ought to be paid in different parts of this country where interest varies? Who will say on what value it shall be paid? It would be a greater trouble, worse than to ascertain reasonable compensation, and it can not be adopted.

3. PAY FOR BUSINESS DONE—EXPERIENCE IN THE CIVIL WAR.

Now, the third plan is to pay for the business actually done. The United States did that during the Civil War. The Government did not take over the great mass of railroads in the United States, and it is interesting to find what business actually was done and what change the war made in that business, because like changes are probable now, other things being equal. The United States paid the ordinary freight and created a railroad profit which largely increased the public expense and the public debt. We do not think it necessary now to do that. The railroad statistics at that time were not kept carefully, as they are now, and it is pretty hard to get statistics from 1861 to 1865. Railroad earnings began to be published in 1862. Railroad stock prices go back to 1854. I can find some statistics even during that time, however, in the Aldrich report of 1893. I have prepared a table which I shall ask leave to print in the RECORD, and I now ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing tables of railroad statistics during the period mentioned, so far as I find them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Mr. PARKER of New Jersey submitted the following tables, marked A to H, preceded by an abstract of the percentages of the figures of 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865 to those of 1860.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will simply give the results of these tables. The first table is of the thousands of tons carried on five or six roads. It is not very useful because it does not show how long the haul was. Table B is valuable. It gives the millions of tons carried 1 mile, and it is instructive to find that, taking the five or six railroads of which we have statistics, their increase of traffic is so similar on each road that I take it all the roads in the United States did about the same thing. Taking 1860 as 100 to get the per cent, 1861 was 109, 9 per cent more; 1862, 158, or 58 per cent more; 1863, 89 per cent more; 1864, 97 per cent more; while 1865 went back to 85 per cent more; that is to say, that during the war the railroad business about doubled. It will, perhaps, more than double in this war, because there are longer hauls and more munitions to carry. It is more a question of supplying food for Europe and food for our armies than it ever was then. There is likely to be a much greater increase during this war. Table C shows that the average freight per ton per mile, in cents, hardly changed until 1864. It was about a cent—0.98—in 1861, 1.008 in 1862, 1.01 in 1863, but in 1864 it was 1.28, and in 1865 it was 1.31. Table D shows the gross freight earnings, which, taking 1860 as 100, were: 1861, 114; 1862, 163; 1863, 206; 1864, 238; and in 1865, 274, so that the freight earnings increased to nearly three times what they were in the beginning of the war. It appears, however, that their expenses did not vary as they do now. All this comes from Aldrich's wonderful report, in four volumes, in 1893—Wages and Prices During Past Years. Table G shows that the index figure of wages ran only from 100 up to 110 in 1863; it became 125, or a quarter more, in 1864, and 143 in 1865. This rise in wages is nothing comparable to what has taken place already in this country, because at that time immigration was open from Europe, where there was no war, and all the poor people of Europe were coming here to do our work. We had no want of labor.

It is not so now. The cost of materials, iron rails, for instance, did go up. It went down from $48 in 1860 to $42.38 per ton in 1861 and down to $41.75 in 1862, but it was $76 in 1863 and $126 in 1864. Those were the conditions. I can not find any table of railroad gross expenses or net earnings. But one thing represents net earnings, and that is the price of railroad stocks, and those prices rose in spite of the rise in the interest rate. In England the railroads are doing more business than they ever did before, but only receiving a standard return; and as Government interest has risen from 3 to 8 per cent, the result is that the people do not care to keep railroad stocks and sell them to buy Government bonds, and the value of stocks has fallen. In America, in spite of the rise of interest during the Civil War, stock that could have been bought for $100 in 1860 or for $78 in the panic of 1861 or for $88 in 1862 would have cost $173 in 1863, $237 in 1864, and $188 in 1865.

The abstract that I have practically read to you is made up of detailed statements, which I file, of such roads as the Boston & Albany, the Fitchburg Railroad, the New York Central, the New York, Lake Erie & Western, the Pennsylvania, and so forth, so far as I could find any statistics of railroads to be used.

Our prosperity in business is likely to be greater now than it was then. The war needs are greater. England and Scotland have enlisted one-ninth of their population, and we may have to do the same. We may have 10,000,000 men on the other side of the water.

More business must be done, especially on the railroads. The amount of freight carried in 1917 will be probably doubled and possibly trebled by the operations of this war. The United States can not be expected to pay the carriers for war freight for all the business done and thus give them two or more billions a year as their profits on war business. They are not entitled to make money out of the United States on war business. It is for that reason that the bill has taken another mode of determining their compensation, and that is the ascertained standard income of the carriers as shown by their standard returns before the war. This is the best that can be done. It is not perfect.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Is the Government paying freight on its war business all the time?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; it is not now. It will be paying freight to the railroads and getting back all the surplus. It makes no difference.

Mr. PLATT. If the Government is not paying freight on the war business——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think the Government is paying freight, but most of this war business is not exactly Government business. It is on materials shipped by munition works to the Government, and the works and factories pay the freight, not the Government of the United States, but the Government receives all the net profits from the railroad treasury, and if these agreements are made it will get the benefit of the war freight.

4. STANDARDIZED RENTAL BASED ON PRIOR INCOME.

A fourth plan is to pay a standardized rental based upon prior income. We are following the example of England in taking the net operating income of a period before the war. England had the advantage that the prior year was one when the world was at peace. The United States has to take years when Europe was at war. In 1915 that war stopped our business; in 1916–17 our carriers got the benefit of the war business of other nations. The three years are probably a fair average of the business as affected by the European war.

5. SHARE WAR PROFITS AS IN ENGLISH MUNITION WORKS.

A fifth course is to divide the extra war profits, as is done in controlled factories. It is a curious matter of history. England and France not only have had to take the railroads, but have had to control labor through the whole country. They could not take one-ninth of their population, more than one-half of their males, into the war without leaving a dearth of labor, while those who have gone to the war make a destruction which has to be supplied. As a result it was found necessary for the Government to control the business of war munitions, and in Pfyfe's wonderful book on the subject he says that all practices which interfere with production and are not founded upon law are abolished. The laws protecting women and children in hours of labor are not abolished. But the rules of the labor unions, which prohibit their being employed on piecework, or prohibit one man from working at the trade of another, or prohibit men from being drawn from one allied trade into another, and prohibit the employment of unskilled labor or women or apprentices, these rules are all suspended, so that no workman can make any objection. Freedom of contract is abolished. The workmen, including clerks, may hire themselves if they have received a leaving certificate from their last employer and may get work elsewhere only if they have such a certificate. Soldier workmen are assigned to controlled establishments. Women workers and half skilled or unskilled workers may come in and receive intensive training, whether they be union or nonunion, by what is called dilution of labor, under control of dilution commissioners, who encourage agreements between employers and workmen and supervise conferences. Commissions determine whether leaving certificates are rightly or wrongly granted. Strikes and lockouts are crimes. The importance of these acts is that controlled establishments extend to every work necessary to successful prosecution of the war.

Munitions of war include not only arms and ammunition, but ships, vehicles, and the metals, machines and tools to make them, constructional steel, fire brick, window and optical glass, factories, machinery, and even workmen's houses. In the controlled factory excess profits are divided.

The Government takes over the factory. It finds out what the standard profit in that factory was before the war. When that is agreed upon the owner is allowed one-fifth more during the war. All profits above that up to a certain percentage or a certain amount are divided generally in certain proportions which are agreed to, although there are some statutes on the subject, and all excess profits above a fixed amount go to the State. For instance, if a factory was declaring a 10 per cent dividend before the war, one-fifth more or 12 per cent would go to the owners of the factory. It might be agreed that excess profits up to 30 per cent more which would be divided, 15 per cent to the Government and 15 per cent to the owner of the factory, everything above the 42 per cent would go to the Government.

It is a curious arrangement, but practical, like most things that John Bull does, because it gives to the person in charge of the factory some interest in his business. We shall preserve the carriers' interest in the railroads only by the fact that they know that they are going to get their property back in a reasonable time, so that the men who work those railroads and who have made them the admiration of the world by carrying freight at rates and in quantities such as no other country has ever done, these men are going to stay with the carriers and run them for the Government, if any tact be shown, so that we will show better results in war than any other country in the world.

These munition acts as to factories are likewise interesting. We too may be forced to have the dilution of labor, as it is called abroad—bringing in the unskilled and training them, whether they be men, women, or children. We too may have to have women as the ticket sellers and ticket collectors and gate tenders.

We may have to get labor as they do there, where women are running the lathes in iron works and running the punches and planing machines and making great shells, and doing it with the skill of men, being aided, whenever possible, by chains and cables operated by steam power which take up the heavy material and put it where wanted. It is a triumph of mind over matter that weak woman can do such work in a way that does not try their strength. If we send our millions to war, we may have to do the same thing.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asked me if I advised this policy. I advise being ready for it, because we may have to do it. Labor is scarce now. Unless we make labor plentiful, we can not win this war, because it is work that will win the war, and nothing else, work in the arts of peace as well as in the arts of war.

REPAIRS AND BETTERMENT ACCOUNTS.

The bill legalizes agreements based upon the standardized returns. There are some complications, as already indicated in my opening, attaching to these standardized returns. The carriers report their gross receipts and their current operating expenses and give what is called a "net operating income," but if they have seen fit not to keep their road or equipment in repair that operating income will be enlarged by the cost of omitted repairs which should have gone against it. If, as carriers often do, they have charged maintenance to the capital account—as I believe all renewals of stations and bridges and permanent works are charged to capital account, without any allowance for the value of those torn down—the diversion of these charges to capital must be very large and must be taken into account. In the case of the Pennsylvania Station in New York and the Grand Central Station in New York or the Union Station here those outlays must be very large.

Many things done by the carriers, such as raising tracks, do not add to their income but often, on the other hand, cut them off from freight yards and sidings which must be built elsewhere. All carriers' accounts are in more or less of a muddle. A scientific man, a writer on technical and scientific subjects, Mr. Amory, came before us and said that our railroads were bankrupt, because they did not charge to income things that belonged to income, and were therefore in debt to the banks. Another railroad expert, Mr. Krutschnitt, admitted that it was a bad business to charge these renewals to capital instead of income, and that if they kept it up they would get into trouble eventually. Our bill has made provision that the Government can adjust those accounts.

It is fortunate that these accounts are probably not so large as the diminution of the standard return which has been made by reason of averaging three years, one of which was a very bad year. More than $100,000,000 a year, I believe, was taken off the standard returns of the railroads by reason of taking three years instead of the last year, 1917. That $100,000,000 a year will take care of a great deal of repairs and omitted maintenance.

It is also to be considered that if the United States does twice as much or three times as much business on those roads than was done before, it pays nothing beyond actual cost of that extra business and can afford, therefore, to take some risk on the repairs that it is to make and the standard return it is to give. On the whole, it may turn out to be better in most cases not to try to be too careful of smaller matters. We hope to be able to make a good bargain, because nobody wants to throw this great matter into the courts. If the railroads will agree to take the average return of the last three years, they will take perhaps less than they were entitled to take, but that will make up for some of the various other questions that they perhaps ought to have taken care of, but did not.

NEW EQUIPMENT.

Now, I believe that disposes of all things except how to account for the new rolling stock and improvements that shall be done by the Government. It is provided that the Government shall pay operating expenses, including such expenses as will keep the property in the same repair as it is now. If the United States pay more, that is a subject of account, to be charged against the carriers. If the Government erects new buildings and terminals, and so forth, there is a provision by which their cost can be charged against the railroads and taken care of by the issuance of stocks and bonds, on which the Government, of course, will pay the interest during the control. But these new improvements will finally belong to the railroads.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will be through in a minute, and then I will yield.

If, on the other hand, the Government buys equipment, rolling stock, and locomotives, the original bill provided that the Government should own them all, and there would be a vast amount of equipment at the end of the war to be disposed of as Congress might direct. The committee has very wisely amended this bill so that while that might be done, the Government has the option to buy this equipment on the accounts of the railroad and make it the property of the railroad, paying for it by the issue of railroad securities, so that an adjustment would be going on from time to time until the property could be handed back.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The stocks and bonds issued for the improvements described by the gentleman would be held by the Government on the collateral until the final settlement and the railroads were turned back?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes; unless they were sold in order to get the money to return such property. If a road issues $100,000,000 of stocks and bonds, the people will take them in the market, and the Government will be reimbursed for the money it spends.

Mr. MADDEN. I take it that at the end of the war the Government would not be able to finance the improvements any better than the railroads.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. As the Government would pay the interest on those bonds out of operating returns, the people would be more secure as to their interest.

CAUSE OF RAILROAD EMBARRASSMENTS.

I may add that one of the reasons why the railroads have fallen down in late years, as I am informed, is because they have been financing lately just as they did some years ago, when their financiers would not issue long-term bonds at high rates of interest and borrowed at cheaper interest upon short-term notes. Since money has been in demand the banks have refused to renew those notes, and there is scarcely a railroad that is not embarrassed somewhat in that respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey may have 10 minutes more.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. One minute more will be enough.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

STATE TAXATION.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There is no other topic left except that of taxes. Some people say we can not control taxes, because the State can lay taxes. I say that the States can not lay taxes on Government business, and my judgment is that the States ought not to be allowed to put on extra taxes when the Government is operating the roads. I think we ought to pay just the same taxes that we paid before the war, and none other.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say. I will insert the tables to which I referred in my remarks:

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman for a minute so that I may ask him a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I yield an additional minute to the gentleman.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. The gentleman from New Jersey referred to the indebtedness that would be created in favor of the Government against the railroads by the purchase of locomotives and other rolling stock and the terminals. Does the gentleman from New Jersey think that the railroads should be turned back to the railroad companies until that indebtedness has been paid to the Government by the railroads?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That proposition was not only that there should be such an indebtedness, but that it should be wiped out by the disposition in the markets of the stocks and bonds of the railroads, which can be done.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Of course, the stocks and bonds might be sold by the railroads or might not.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If they are not sold, then they would owe the Government, and the railroads would not go back until that was arranged for. The bill says so.

Mr. SIMS. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS], a member of the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the bill, H. R. 9685, now before the House, providing for suitable legislation for Federal control of the railroads of the country, contains, generally speaking, only three points that are in controversy.

The first is contained in section 1, which fixes the compensation that the carriers are to receive during the period the roads are under the control of the Federal Government.

The second is contained in section 11, which places the power to initiate a rate, when the war emergency makes it necessary, in the President.

The third is involved in section 14, which contains the provision for the return of the railroads within two years after the conclusion of the war. I shall address myself to the question of the limitation placed in section 14. I am in full accord with all of the provisions of this bill excepting section 14, and at the proper time I shall offer an amendment striking out the limitation placed in the bill, leaving it for a future Congress to fix the date for the return of the roads to their corporate owners after suitable legislation has been enacted.

It is argued by the representatives of the administration and Commissioner Anderson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that great danger is involved in fixing the date for the return of these roads to their corporate owners, for the reason that the greatest confusion will likely prevail at the conclusion of the war, and that the people in all probability will not be in a mood to consider necessary legislation that must be enacted before these roads are turned back to their alleged owners. It will possibly be a year following the conclusion of peace before the soldiers are all returned home and discharged. During this period it is not probable that it will be possible to even consider the turning back of these roads. The people will be distracted by the difficulties confronting the country in readjusting business to peace conditions. There will be an immense demand for capital, and the difficulty of the railroads in financing themselves will no doubt be a very great one.

In fact, it is so self-evident that troubles of the first magnitude will prevail at that time in the domestic field that it seems hardly necessary to recount them. I quote here, in part, a statement made by Secretary McAdoo, Director General of the Railroads, on this subject before the House and Senate Committees on Interstate Commerce:

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY M'ADOO.

From the public standpoint it is necessary that Government possession and control of railroads shall be employed to remove for the time being competitive practices and wasteful duplication of effort to the end that every energy shall be mobilized upon the production of the greatest amount of transportation with the least expenditure of labor, material, and money. The result of this process of unification will be that when the war ends the railroads will be, to a large extent, disabled for the immediate resumption of their old competitive status. It will be clearly contrary to the public interests that the railroads thus hampered in their ability to compete shall be returned to private management before the adoption of proper methods of public control to take the place of the competition which will have been substantially extinguished.

The adoption of a proper measure of public control to deal with this new condition will require careful study and discussion. The period immediately succeeding the war will present numerous problems of the gravest sort, some of them very grave economic problems which will demand immediate consideration by the Congress.

In such circumstances it is not only probable but almost certain that Congress will not find the time immediately after the close of the war to adopt a comprehensive plan for controlling the railroads in the new environment in which they will find themselves and at the same time to deal with all the other complicated economic problems which will undoubtedly confront it.

If this bill requires the railroads to be turned back to their owners within say a year, as I have heard suggested, or other comparatively short period after the return of peace, the result will be that the railroads, with competition largely extinguished, will go back into private control without legislation to protect the public, or legislation designed to protect the public will have to be enacted hastily in the midst of other problems which will be demanding the entire time and attention of Congress. Neither result can be made in the public interest.

At the same time it should be borne in mind that shippers and the public generally will be accustomed to new methods of doing business with the railroads. They will find that the old methods under which they have been routing freight and have been doing business will be substantially and perhaps permanently altered, and the confusion which would arise from the attempt to suddenly restore the old competitive status, the status that existed prior to December 28, 1917, would be aggravated very greatly and perhaps would offer quite insuperable difficulties if legislation was not enacted in the light of conditions as they exist at that time, such as would facilitate that process of restoration and conserve the interests of the shippers and the public generally. I think myself that ample time will be required to deal with the new railroad status with which the country will be confronted after the return of peace.

I have used this three-year period arbitrarily and merely for purposes of illustration, and I have proceeded upon the theory that possibly $500,000,000 per annum might have to be expended upon betterment, improvements, equipment, and extensions—necessary extensions for the purpose of the war. Of course, if the control lasted only one year or two years the amount of the Government investment in roads would be correspondingly less.

It is impossible to deal with that matter adequately under existing laws and impossible now to forecast how the matter ought to be dealt with. It will be a subject for thorough study and careful and just legislation to be adopted after the war.

To put a time limit upon Government possession may make it impracticable and certainly will make it exceedingly difficult to deal with this important subject in an adequate manner before possession is automatically restored to private management. To fix an arbitrary limit, it seems to me, is to put the public at a great disadvantage in dealing with this important phase of the problem—that is, the adjustment of the debt which the railroad companies will owe to the Government for the advance which must be made to them during the period of Government control. Such improvements in the hands of the Government without possession of the railroads will be of little value. The Government would therefore be in a difficult situation to protect the public interest with respect to those advances, because the minute the railroads are returned automatically to the control of the railroad companies, with no settlement effected of that large indebtedness, the Government would not be in position to protect adequately its rights nor to protect the public interest.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that the Congress of the United States under the conditions that he has just described through Mr. McAdoo will be any less mindful of the interests of the people than they are to-day?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. MADDEN. Or that Congress will be less patriotic?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. No; certainly not; but there might be difficulties in the way of getting action in Congress. Mr. McAdoo continues:

It seems to me, therefore, that there is every disadvantage to the public interest in risking a limitation upon the time of Government control of the railroads and no possible advantage to the people in fixing that time limit now.

As long as the Government is in control of the properties and the important problems can be discussed dispassionately, and not under the pressure of a stop watch or time limit, it will be possible, I think, to liquidate the Government's interest upon a more equitable basis not only to the public but to the railroad owners themselves.

For my part I do not see why we should now undertake to determine an arbitrary limit, which might put the public as well as the private interests in jeopardy, but every consideration, it seems to me, justifies, as well as demands, that the question be left in such situation that it can be dealt with intelligently by the Congress in the light of conditions as they then exist.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Would not that be the case, anyway, that Congress, even though it now fixed the time for the return of the railroads, would have the right to repeal that law?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Oh, certainly; that is undoubtedly true; but conditions might arise where Congress could not act, and I am now going to read to you a statement of Commissioner Anderson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, pointing out the possible difficulties that may arise at that future date.

Mr. BORLAND. I was going to ask the gentleman whether it would not have the effect of stabilizing and strengthening the value of railroad securities, and thus ease the money market, if it were definitely established in this bill that the railroads would eventually be returned to the stock and bond holders?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I do not think so. I think that absolutely the opposite is true. The very moment the Government took over these railroads the stocks and bonds of the roads rose in value on the market, showing conclusively that the people have greater confidence in the control by the Government over the roads than they have in the control of those who were in charge of the railroads prior to the Government taking them over.

COMMISSIONER ANDERSON'S STATEMENT.

I wish now to quote from the testimony of Commissioner Anderson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as to the possibility of failing to secure legislation before the day fixed for the return of roads, and the disaster that would surely follow:

We will assume the treaty of peace is concluded the middle of July, one week after you have adjourned, or something of that kind, or a month. But the reasons why we did not undertake to set the time limit were mainly two. In the first place, no Congress binds any succeeding Congress, and it is clear that the Congress must take the responsibility of dealing with the status; in the second place, it was thought that if there should happen to be a Congress divided in opinion, and an actual time limit put in, you would create a speculative situation with relation to a lot of railroad securities, and particularly with relation to the fate of some of the weaker companies, that would be in its actual results no less than wicked, as applied to some of the less fortunate holders of railroad securities.

If the existing status continues until Congress otherwise determines, then every person, every corporation whose interests are possibly to be affected adversely and unfairly by any proposed measure of resumption of private control, they must have their day before this committee or some committee that deals with that, and the matter is fully heard, if you have a stop order, and the Congress perhaps more or less affected by partisan considerations—nobody knows—perhaps a division between Congress and the President, a chaos is to take place on a day named, unless Congress acts and extends the time.

It might be an evenly divided Congress, either on partisan lines or on policy lines or discord between Congress and the President. It puts a premium on discord for speculative interests that would like to see the railroad-security market thrown into speculative chaos; that is what it does. Let me illustrate that: Suppose that you had a provision that it should last a year after the war, after the treaty of peace? Suppose the treaty of peace were signed on July 1 next, and then you have got another year. You come back here next December and you begin on this thing, and Congress is closely divided on party lines and on questions of economic policy; and you begin, and you go through December, January—you do not generally do much until January. You have really got six months in which to find and determine the policy on which these carriers shall be taken out of the Federal control and put back into the hands of their groups of security holders; and if you do not agree there is chaos on July 1, 1919, is there not? The agreement is the condition precedent to order. That is your situation. Now, order prevails under Federal control until Congress substitutes some other order.

A CHOICE BETWEEN FEDERAL CONTROL AND GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

Those who favor a time limit for the return of the roads offer three reasons:

First. That a date should be set as indicating that the Government did not intend to keep control indefinitely and thereby cause confusion and uncertainty in the minds of the investors.

Second. Admitting that new legislation will be necessary, they insist two years will be sufficient time for Congress to act.

Third. They desire the time limit because it will be an indication that this Congress is opposed to Government ownership.

The truth of the matter is, the third reason is the main one in the minds of most of the objectors. The first two reasons are no reasons at all and not a fact supports them, while, on the contrary, all the evidence presented to our committee proved the contrary true. The investors are calm and happy now that the Federal Government is protecting their property from the speculators, and the evidence pointing to possible delay in procuring legislation is complete and uncontroverted.
